

• Dorothy Brant Brazier:

'Tourists' To View Seattle Homes

Women enjoy poking around other people's houses and gardens, especially in strange cities. But tourists seldom have a chance to do so, unless they have a lot of friends in the city in which they are visiting.

But during the Seattle World's Fair, the little woman from Dubuque, Iowa, will be able to see inside some of Seattle's loveliest homes and the ardent gardener from Fort Wayne, Ind., will thrill to the masses of the Washington State flower if they are here at the right times in May, and visitors from some landlocked part of the country will see how Seattle's gardens grow right to the edge of the water, during July and August.

Not strictly for the woman visitor, of course, but of particular interest to women will be:

The architectural tour of the Seattle Art Museum, May 10. A total of 14 Washington Park homes (one will show only pool and cabana) will be open that day and tea will be served in two of them. Proceeds benefit the museum's operating fund. (Tickets are available now at the museum; reservations, of course, are limited.)