

At The Front

War hit the Freshmen practically the least of any of the classes in school, because as a rule the men were too young to enter the Reserve Officer's training camp at Fort Sheridan. Only one man, Allan Crane, has gone to camp near Chicago, where he will train for three months.

Bill Euard was the first one of the class to leave school. He went first to Kewanee and joined the National Guard. As the GALE goes to press, he is at Camp Reig, East St. Louis, awaiting orders from the war department.

Homer Sharp, our "prexy," is the other one that has entered the military service. Sharp has had more than four years of science and tactics and received a very sudden call to report "at once" at Port Royal, North Carolina. The camp which he has entered is made up of men who have had at least four years of military drill. They will be put thru three weeks of the most intensive drill, after which they will be put in command of a detachment, which they will train "somewhere in the U. S.," until they become of age. At that time they will receive commissions as officers.

The class wishes all possible success to its president and representatives in the service of "Uncle Sam."

Many others have left to join the "Harvest Army." We expect, at this time, they are blowing laboriously with the sweat pouring in streams from their foreheads.

To these men in the field we also wish "good luck with the crops."
