

Rez Band rocks Waco

By KEVIN TANKERSLEY

The setting just didn't seem right for a Christian music concert. There was a cold cement floor and a low ceiling. The smell of popcorn permeated the cool spring night. Wrestling matches would have fit into the scenario, but not Christian music.

A predominantly teen-age crowd filled the General Exhibits Building at the Heart O' Texas Fairgrounds. They were there for some hard-hitting, driving Christian rock 'n' roll. They were not to be disappointed. Resurrection Band was in town.

Castle, a Waco band, opened the evening. They played about a 30-minute set, and did an adequate job. They could use a little more stage presence, but that will come with experience. The audience responded nicely, but didn't really get too excited.

That all changed when Resurrection Band hit the stage. Before the concert, lead singer Glenn Kaiser said it was going to be intense. He was right. They started out loud and kept going strong for two hours.

They opened with "City Streets," followed by "Amazing." The next song, "Militant Man," brought the crowd to its feet, clapping and cheering.

Many of the songs Rez Band performed were from their latest album, DMZ, which is a strong, powerful production. The band loses nothing in their transition to the live stage.

Singer Wendy Kaiser, wife of the lead singer, spoke to the audience between numbers, often going from screaming vocals one minute to soft-spoken conversation the next. During these talks with the audience, she shared personal experiences of her life and beliefs.

As the introduction to "Mamma Don't Love Daddy Anymore," Glenn explained why he wrote the song. "Everyone in my family has gone through at least one divorce, except my wife Wendy and I. Also, I wrote it because many marriages of Christian musicians are breaking up. That's off the wall. That's not a good example of what Christianity is all about."

The next two songs, "Colours" and "American Dream," allowed the band to jam and show off their talents. Lead guitarist Stu Heiss and Glenn both were hitting hot licks on their guitars.

Glenn's constant moving about and seemingly endless energy on stage kept the crowd alive.

The group began to wind up the concert with "Area 312." This was one of their better songs of the evening. Wendy described "Area 312" as the time "when your boyfriend breaks up with you. You get the bag of Oreos and a gallon of milk and drink yourself into oblivion, the dog leaves the room when you walk in and you get your report cards . . . all in the same day."

The last song of the night was "I'm So In Love With You," which was followed by a testimony from Glenn. In his testimony, he spoke about how some young people today make gods out of many things, such as cars, boy-friends or girlfriends — and in some cases, rock groups such as AC/DC or Judas Priest. "Some of you may even consider Rez Band your god," he said. When relating back to his youth Glenn remembered that his gods were "sex, drugs and rock 'n' roll."

After his testimony, Glenn offered a chance for those who felt a need, desire or calling to get their lives right with God, to come to the front of the stage and pray with him. Between 40 and 50 people answered this invitation.

Resurrection Band is an outreach ministry of Jesus People USA, a Chicago-based organization. Wendy described Jesus People as "an inner-city Christian community that ministers to and supplies needs to those around us. It's not enough to tell them (about Jesus) if we don't take care of their other needs. We all do with less so others can have some. We pool our resources, so there's more to share with other people."

Even though their ministry may be different from most ministries, Resurrection Band's beliefs come back to Jesus. Stated Glenn, "God said this is the only way. This is my only Son. This is the only truth."

RAGE clearly defines music as a hobby and a profession

By LISA BERKMAN AND DEBBIE COWNOVER

It was a sunny Saturday afternoon. We were contemplating the pros and cons of probing the minds of the musicians we'd met the night before on a dark, luminous evening in a smoke-filled Inner Visions (Waco club) where these five men stood alone in a burning rage (RAGE) and slowly released a crowd of nine-to-livers' of their bondage from a 40-hour workload. We pulled into the motel filled with apprehension. Would the room be flowing with booze, broads and bouncers as the club had been the night before? As we ascended the staircase, the view of the open door calmed our tension. We entered the cluttered room of tennis shoes, jamblasters, cassettes and suitcases where two members of the band were staying. Drummer John Douglas greeted us, as bass guitarist Dennis Hicks grabbed the phone to call the other members of the band for the interview. Three minutes had elapsed when lead guitarist, Richard Vail, darted to the doorway, discreetly scoping the area for fans, and then dashed into the room where in a witty manner he took off the star-shaped sunglasses and said, "Hi, girls." His t-shirt, jeans and thongs surprised us, as we were expecting a carbon copy of the flashy performer we'd seen on stage. No sooner had Vail made his dynamic entrance than the lead vocalist, Ricky Cunningham, strolled in and sat down beside Douglas. The RAGE team was complete when Allen Trejo, guitarist/keyboards, and his girlfriend, Kris Monch, arrived.

After introductions were made, Hicks explained RAGE'S background. "The original band was formed in '77. I had played around with the bass guitar in my latter years in high school. After a couple of years of playing, I met Richard (Vail) in San Diego where we began RAGE and went full-time with it in '78," he said. Vail's musical talent emerged during his elementary school years. He elaborated, "I played the piano for six years during grade school. I was a junior in college when I started playing the guitar. I worked in a one-man-band for a while in San Diego before I met Dennis."

After only five days of practice, Cunningham joined the stage with RAGE for the first time during a gig at the Mexia prom in 1981. Nineteen eighty-two brought two more members to the RAGE family, Douglas and Trejo. Douglas took some time away from his preoccupation of designing a logo for the band to share his first interest in music. "I played in a marching band throughout high school. Before I joined RAGE, I taught drum lessons." He recalled his childhood memories as "being an experience for my parents. I was always banging around on pots and pans."

was working with an Elvis impersonator and Sha-Na-Na. Trejo's azure eyes twinkled again as he said, "One of the first times I played in a band on my own was for a Baptist church. It was really wild because nobody was dancing and we only played seven songs. After it was over they collected $40 and each of us got $10. I thought that was real neat to get paid to do something I enjoyed so much. That's when I decided to go pro." Where some bands treat their music as a hobby or a way to go out and party, RAGE clearly defines their music as a way of making a living. It's a profession to them. Just as a lawyer in a three-piece suit walks into a courtroom planning to win his case, RAGE goes on stage in brightly colored costumes — complete with tightly fitting satin pants to present the crowd with a hard-hitting testimonial to rock 'n' roll.

Sing, singers, sing

By MARK LEMENAGER

Months of hard work culminate in a weekend of professional quality entertainment every year when Baylor students present their annual All-University "Sing." It is an entertainment highlight of the year for the college community and a major contribution toward providing more entertaining cultural attractions in Waco. Begun in 1953, "Sing" today bears little resemblance to its 30-year-old predecessor. The acts of 1953 had no choreography, elaborate costumes or stage props. Participants stood and sang on risers. Eleven acts competed for three trophies. Today most clubs spend a minimum of $2,500-$4,000 — some clubs spend as much as $10,000. Only the winning acts have much hope of breaking even. Competition between clubs in "Sing" is rabid and constant. Clubs elect "Sing" chairmen in the weeks following the performance. The chairmen immediately begin reserving ideas and music for the next year's themes. Over the summer as many as three separate acts will be worked out on paper. No more than two or three club members will know the songs being considered. Leaks could result in a valued song being "stolen" by another club. By Christmas most acts are ready to be rehearsed and finetuned. In the next few months, normal college students will be transformed into singing and dancing machines via grueling nightly practices and the over-present (and by now unbelievably unpopular) "Sing" chairmen. Unfortunately, this miraculous transformation does not escape the attention of most Baylor faculty members. Dr. Jerry Johnson, Baylor Marketing professor and an advisor on the Baylor Inter-Fraternity Council commented, "There's a definite decline in student's performances during 'Sing'." Perhaps that's due more to lack of time management than "Sing" itself. In some cases, I think students use "Sing" as an excuse to neglect more important things." Judging sometimes also creates some hard feelings for participants. Clubs often feature upbeat pop songs in their acts that please the crowd but are rated poorly by the judges. Mark Dameron, Baylor Chamber of Commerce member, and two-time winning "Sing" chairman, stressed the importance of keeping "Sing" in perspective. "Clubs have to remember to cater to the judges as well as try to get enthusiastic audience response. 'Sing' is a competition," Dameron added, "Sing is like any other event; success depends on creativity and ingenuity; if you create a winning attitude, you'll win." Julio Gamble, a member of Delta Delta Delta sorority summed up her "Sing" experience. Her club placed first in last year's show and seventh in this spring's performance. "I'd do it all again, grades and all. Years from now, who'll remember an accounting test? I'll remember that we won 'Sing'!" In any case, "Sing" has become a tradition at Baylor and in Waco, albeit a controversial one. In the weeks following "Sing", the editorial pages of Baylor Lariat are littered with letters addressing "Sing." Some call for changes in the judging system, others for limits on budgets and rehearsal hours. In its thirty year history, "Sing" has become bigger and flashier every spring. If you missed this year's show, be sure to make next fall's "Pigskin Revue" during Baylor's Homecoming weekend. The "Revue" features the top seven acts from last week's show.

After losing their lead vocalist in '81, Vail and Hicks found themselves searching for a replacement. In Dallas they found the present lead vocalist, soft-spoken Ricky Cunningham. At this point, attention was turned to Cunningham for his band synopsis. The tall, lean vocalist kicked back against a pillow and casually placed a portion of his long, silky brunette hair behind his shoulder and in a shy tone said, "I've played in bands since I was 12 years old. We played a lot of proms and dances. I've been on the road with five different professional bands over a period of seven years before I joined RAGE." After only five days of practice, Cunningham joined the stage with RAGE for the first time during a gig at the Mexia prom in 1981. Nineteen eighty-two brought two more members to the RAGE family, Douglas and Trejo. Douglas took some time away from his preoccupation of designing a logo for the band to share his first interest in music. "I played in a marching band throughout high school. Before I joined RAGE, I taught drum lessons." He recalled his childhood memories as "being an experience for my parents. I was always banging around on pots and pans."

The desire for a drum set was something with which Trejo could identify. As his blue eyes sparkled with a childlike gleam, he leaned forward from his chair and excitedly said, "I remember one Christmas I wanted a drum set really bad, but my parents bought me an acoustic guitar instead. It sat in the corner for months." Trejo finally picked up his guitar and the desire for a snare and sticks was replaced by a passion for the pick and strings. "I went to work in a car wash when I was 15 to save enough money to buy an electric guitar and amp." He developed a talent for the guitar. By his senior year in high school he hope it will come out some time this year," said Hicks. Like other professionals, RAGE works every day of the year except in June, when they take a two-week vacation. In keeping with their professionalism, RAGE goes on stage with the support of their lighting technicians and sound crew, presenting the audience with a performance hard to forget. RAGE rocks the crowd with the sounds of Sammy Hagar, AC/DC, Billy Squier and Van Halen to name a few. "When we go on stage, we encourage people to let loose and forget their problems for a while," said Hicks. "If the audience is inhibited, we challenge them. We scream at them if we have to. We build up and play even better," said Cunningham. On a more comical note, Trejo said, "I'm a Gemini. I have an alter ego. When I'm on stage, it's my twin 'Alvin' who takes over." Trejo's girlfriend, Kris Monch, travels with the band occasionally. Monch sits in the audience and views Allen and "Alvin." When asked what it felt like to be a part of the RAGE family, Monch replied, "It's a lot of fun to sit back and watch the guys perform and know that I'm a part of them." Monch added, "At times it's sort of hard, because the band has to establish a rapport with the audience and every now and then I feel a little bit left out. But Allen and I have an understanding. That helps to make it easier." Douglas's girlfriend lives in Houston. "We also have an understanding. She's a very intelligent and understanding person. Trust is the key word in our relationship. I suppose that's why we've been together for about a year-and-a-half now." While the band remains serious in their professional and personal lives, there's still room for development in both. "Every band goes through stages. I think we're at the second level right now," said Cunningham. "People should decide for themselves what they want to do with their lives. They have to go through the same type of trials. This profession just has higher stakes. You're either broke or well-off. Like Ricky said, we're in a middle stage right now. We don't live on a shoestring," said Hicks. Douglas summed up the band members feelings when he said, "If it's in your blood, you'll never be happy until you do it."

Ex MCC student finds career niche at Baylor

By WYNONA TROUP

"Sports Information Department, Terry Tacker speaking. May I help you?"

"Sports Illustrated calling? Yes, I have the information you need."

"Sports Illustrated doesn't call often, but they call, and other sports magazines as well," said Tacker, who is a 1978 MCC graduate. About 90 percent of the Baylor sports news on the radio, TV or newspapers comes from Tacker's office.

"Yet, when I tell people where I work, they don't know we exist or what we do," he said.

"Maxey Parrish and I cover all the sports events and write the stats — and send out weekly news releases all over the nation. If the magazines see a story in these releases, they call us for details or interviews," said Tacker.

Tacker, assistant to Parrish, covers the women's basketball games and Parrish covers the men's teams. They divide the other sports: baseball, track, volleyball, etc. But it takes both of them to cover football games.

Often, they spend 60 hours a week gathering and writing the news and brochures to keep the media abreast with Baylor sports activities. Brochures, or media guides, are important in recruiting top players.

"The students and their parents must be impressed with the schools athletic standards. Texas is so sports-minded that if a schools team's reputation falls, unfortunately, the reputation of the teachers and classes also falls. The alumni and supporters feel let-down. So, you see, our job in putting out impressive booklets into the hands of our coaches is important," Tacker said. "Journalism classes at MCC really prepared me for this job. Being a smaller school, I learned more because I could be personally active. I loved working on the paper. I studied under Carolyn Dobson and Christine Wicker.

"The first time that we went to The Citizen to lay out and print the MCC tabloid, I asked them when was Mrs. Dobson coming? "She's not," they said. "Golly, you mean we have to do it ourselves?" I said, "It was good training that I'm still using," Tacker said.

Tacker was MCC sports editor one semester, managing editor the next. He wrote on other subjects as well, and he won press awards.

When he went to Baylor from MCC, he became student assistant in the Information Department and has been there ever since.

"It's your whole life, certainly a bachelor's life," he said. "We're on the road a lot — an exciting job to do while you're young. You have to love sports and I do," he said. "I guess I got it from my father, Pat Tacker."

About two years ago The Tribune-Herald wrote an article about the Information Office and stated that Tacker, Baylor journalism major, was the assistant to Maxey Parrish and that they were "the youngest University sports information directors staff in the country."

Tacker's brother, Tommy, who was a trainer at Baylor, would bring home press guides. Tacker decided to find out who did them. Suddenly, he found himself doing them. The booklets are much larger now and have prettier covers in color. Tommy Tacker is now athletic trainer for the Waco Independent School District.

When asked if he knew Terry Tacker,

Baylor Coach Grant Teaff said, "Oh yes, he's a jewel. We couldn't do without him."

During the games, the duo hosts the visiting schools' media. "With a 110-seating capacity in our press box, we usually have 20 or 30 writers. TV crews will bring 10 or 15 people and about 50 TV and other people to entertain."

"When Baylor plays out of town — like when they played in Ohio — we went on in advance to boost ticket sales," Tacker adding, "and to promote Baylor."

In the summer when the sports activity slows down, "we have more time to do writing and put books together."

"It's a busy life, but we have good coaches, as good as you get in the whole conference. They're easy to work with. Coach Teaff took radio and TV in college, so he knows how it is. He makes our job easier. Writers call him and he'll return their calls. Some coaches won't," Tacker said.

"You wouldn't believe the excitement around here when Baylor won the championship in 1980. I got to go to the Cotton Bowl with them. We left the day after Christmas and didn't come back until Jan. 2."

"We stayed at Loew's Anatole Hotel. It was unbelievable. It was exciting to be with the team in an official capacity," he said.

Tacker continued, "MCC has been good to me. In fact, we have so many coaches and employees over here at the stadium office that we call it "MCC south." We just moved from their North station to the South," Tacker said.

"Oh, excuse me, there's the phone. Hello, Associated Press? Yes, I have that information for you."

1983 edition of Highlander baseball continues to dominate

By TRACEY THOMPSON

The MCC Highlander baseball team provided no surprises since last publication date.

They continued to dominate on the diamond, winning nine games in a 14-day span, upping their spectacular record to 29-5.

The most exciting game of the week would have to be the 10-inning affair against the Hill Rebels that took place March 29. The Highlanders snagged a win, 7-6.

In the second inning, Hill's Felix "Cat" Cortez put MCC in the hole early, 2-0. As Cortez stepped into the box, a few faithful MCC fans began ridiculing his nickname with barks and yelps. These few were suddenly muzzled as Cortez sent a two-run shot over the right-field wall.

David Turner managed to get MCC back in the ballgame with a two-run single in the third, scoring Dodd Johnson and Greg Dennis. Turner later scored on a blatant error by Hill's right-fielder, who dropped a lazy pop-fly hit by Jay Buhner. After three innings MCC held a slim lead, 3-2.

Hill tied the score in the fourth, and then went up by a run in the sixth, 4-3.

MCC's Kurt Prewitt knotted things up in the bottom of the same frame, driving home David Wrzesinski with a line-drive single.

Hill provided a little fright in the top of the seventh. MCC reliever Jerry Faught came through in the clutch by fanning Cortez, leaving Hill's Johnny Morgan stranded on third base.

In the bottom of the eighth, it looked as if MCC was ready to put the Rebels six feet under. The Highlanders had the base with only one out, but Hill hurler Adam Helleck had other ideas, popping-up one batter and then sending Lanny Hengst down swinging to end the inning.

The drama continued in the top of the tenth, when Hill staked themselves out to a two-run lead. But while it was the Rebels who had the "Cat" on their side, it was the Highlanders who possessed the nine lives.

With everything on the line in the bottom of the tenth, Helleck began to waver, walking Buhner, Wrzesinski, and Mike Qualls. Julian Gonzales then stepped up to the plate for the Highlanders and promptly drilled a two-run single to tie things up at 6-6.

MCC's Johnson then decided to end the lopsided plot with a single that ended the elongated production.

MCC dominated the second game of the double-header, 7-1.

Earlier in the two-week period the Highlanders swept two series against Northwood Institute and Angelina College. Against Northwood the Highlanders took three games: 3-2, 8-0, and 6-2. MCC registered two victories against Navarro, 9-5 and 11-5.

MCC routed Hill on March 28 also, 13-3, to sweep the series.

In the last ball game before presstime, the Highlanders blasted Central Arizona 11-2 as Chuck Bradley hurled a four-hitter and Jay Buhner went 3-for-3 and clubbed a homer.

MCC will take on Howard College in a double-header today at 1 p.m.

True Grit Cowboy: Is it right for you?

You say you want to be a cowboy? Well, put this into your Stetson and think on it.

Modern cowboys must be college educated. This "agri-person" can't just farm like granddad did.

Modern technology, and changing times require that the college education include courses in microbiology, three of four chemistry classes, physics, technical writing, nutrition, genetics, finance and yes, even computers.

The modern farmer/rancher must know how to write letters, how to talk to bankers and how to balance books. He/she must be a good organizer and time manager. It helps to think like a cow, work like a horse, manage money like a juggler and gamble on everything, especially the weather. Most don't even own a horse, but the tractor is usually newer than the family car. A little good luck and a lot of prayers never hurt any either.

But farming and ranching are not the only agricultural jobs available. Walter Kruse, MCC agriculture instructor said, "The job outlook for agriculture is as great as or greater than any field with a bachelor's degree. There may not as wide a variation but it's as consistent."

"Job opportunities and salary range on a par with other fields," said Kruse. "In fact, agricultural fields require highly-skilled people. The rate of technology has changed twice as fast as in the manufacturing fields. For example, an ag. economics major must be better trained than a business major. College competition is tough!"

What may come as a surprise is the fact that computers have been in the agri-business world for as long as 30 years. Kruse pointed out that "other fields such as banking haven't been truly computerized except for the past 10 years or so." He added that in the past few years some four year universities (such as A&M) have begun requiring beginning freshman to take special computer courses. Some large feedlots and fertilizer and feed plants have been using computers for years to mix rations, figure yields, rate of gains, etc.

Currently, the high-interest agriculture fields include poultry and dairy science, entomology, embryology and embryo transplants. The environmental craze has focused on pesticides and herbicides. More attention has been given to organic farming.

With so much emphasis on health and nutrition, the poultry people are enjoying a push in the right direction. "Meanwhile, the beef and pork producers are feeling a squeeze. They must change elements of their own production — more efficient breeding and management," said Kruse.

And what about women in agriculture? "The percentage of women involved in agriculture is still low; only about one-fourth to one-third of the work force is female," said Kruse. "A few are being seen in sales, quite a number in horticulture." Other fields such as wildlife management, marine biology, and all areas of research are being explored by women. And quite aptly, too."

But the fact remains that the young agri-business graduate isn't going back to the farm. Instead he's being drawn to the big cities — Dallas, Houston, New York — where the profit margin isn't low, the cost of production isn't too high, and where there are fewer variables.

The outlook for agriculture is changing. On the average, those farmers and ranchers still in the business have either inherited their business or have married into it. The image for today's farmer is also changing. Most of all he loves the land, and he's proud to be a farmer.

"He has to. He certainly isn't getting rich," said Kruse.

Mason makes MCC her home court

By WYOMA KIRVEN

Coach Charlotte Mason is a woman with many talents who is also a competitor. She continues a successful career as MCC women's basketball coach. Mason is a native of Colorado and graduate of Arvada High School. Mason started her career as an all-around athlete early in life.

A graduate of Wayland Baptist College, Mason coached on the high school level at Eastland High from 1968-76 and at Kerrville-Tivy High from 1976-79. During her years as high school coach, Mason also coached women's track and volleyball. While at Kerrville, Coach Mason led her 440-yard relay team to a number three national ranking.

Not only has Mason led a successful career in coaching, she has excelled as an athlete. Mason played in two National Basketball Tournaments, pitched in two National Softball (fast pitch) Tournaments and traveled through 18 states while competing with a consistently nationally ranked ASA softball team.

"I wanted to coach college ball. That was the only chance I had to move up the ladder."

After completing her coaching stint in high school, she found her way to MCC in 1979. "I wanted to coach college ball. That was the only chance I had to move up the ladder. My first year here at MCC, I wasn't left with a lot because the former coach, Pam Davis, took all the players with her. So it wasn't a very good year, with a conference record of 14-15. That was the second losing season that I ever had," said Mason.

She added, "The following years, the seasons improved increasingly. In the 1980-81 season, we won the conference with a 26-6 record. From there, we went to the NJCAC Regionals. And in 1981-82 we were second in conference, with 23-9 season record. We also qualified for the Regionals playoffs, where we captured second." This past season, Mason led a young, talented team to the NJCAC Regionals, with a 16-0 conference record (24-5 on the season). At one time, the MCC Highladies were ranked number 15 in the nation among the Junior colleges. This is a history-breaking record for the Lassies. Mason said, "I told them all year long that we have one of the best teams among the Junior colleges. There's not another team with our speed. We really earned a chance to be ranked. Being ranked at the end of the year is really good, because it made my girls come out more and become aware of the talent they do have."

"This is a team really into playing basketball. All of them are ready to play and with that kind of attitude, I think we'll be very effective."
