NOTES:

#7 Bott's Court. Rating: TWO. Period: PRE-FEDERAL The unusually high foundation of this two-story, wooden, gambrel roofed house suggests that it was moved to this location, and such seems to be the case. According to Old Naumkeag, it was a tavern-- "At the sign of the Eagle"-- kept by Jacob Bacon in 1794 near the site of the Athenaeum. Later it was the home of Captain William Mugford, famous for saving William Gray's ship, the Ulysses, by devising a rudder when the original rudder was damaged. G.G Putnam wrote that Mugford had a pair of emu's eggs standing in front of his house. The central chimney is gone. A federal entrance is hidden by later trim. Some early twelve-over-twelve windows remain. (SALEM HISTORIC DISTRICT STUDY COMMITTEE INVESTIGATION)

"Old Chestnut street had its oddities, oh, yes! Just imagine a ferry in Bott's court as we know it today. Yet William H. Foster in his recollections, delighted to recall how he floated down "Bradshaw's gutter" in a punt on his way to school through Bott's court. There was a brook, so dubbed- quite a sizeable and vigorous water course in the spring of the year, in Mr. Foster's boyhood, so expansive and deep that a punt with a pole was kept in the court for the public convenience in crossing from Essex to Chestnut street.

Comrade William Lander, adjutant and past commander of Phillip H. Sheridan, Post 34, informs me that he remembers the brook in Bott's court when he was a boy and there may be others who can recall it.

Although it does not appear on the old maps, this brook was undoubtedly fed by springs in the hollow of the original Bott's court and ran its course through the marshy land across or under Chestnut street, and so down through the meadow of broad fields to the old South mill pond." (Salem Evening News - March 23, 1923)

JACOB BACON

Dr. Jacob Bacon was born on August 25, 1751, a son of the Reverend Jacob (A.B. 1731) and Mary (Wood) Bacon. The family had been driven from Upper Ashuelot by the Indians, and the Parson had been installed over the Third Church of Plymouth in 1749, but it was at Boxford, his mother's home, that Jacob was born. At college, he roomed in Massachusetts 32 with Osgood '71, waited on table, served as a scholar of the House, and held a Browne Scholarship. He took both degrees with his Class.

Bacon served an apprenticeship with Dr. James Brickett of Haverhill, and may have begun practice in Woburn, because a man of his name marched with the Woburn company on the Nineteenth of April and was wounded in the battle. If this was our man, his wound was not serious, for our Jacob was examined and approved as surgeon's mate in Colonel Scammon's regiment on July 4, 1775. He served at Bunker Hill, and when the army was reorganized at the end of the year, he was appointed surgeon's mate to the Seventh Continentals, with whom he served for twelve months. In April, 1777, he was inoculated in the army hospital.² In the autumn of that year he sailed as surgeon of the privateer Freedom,³ was captured, and exchanged in October, 1780.

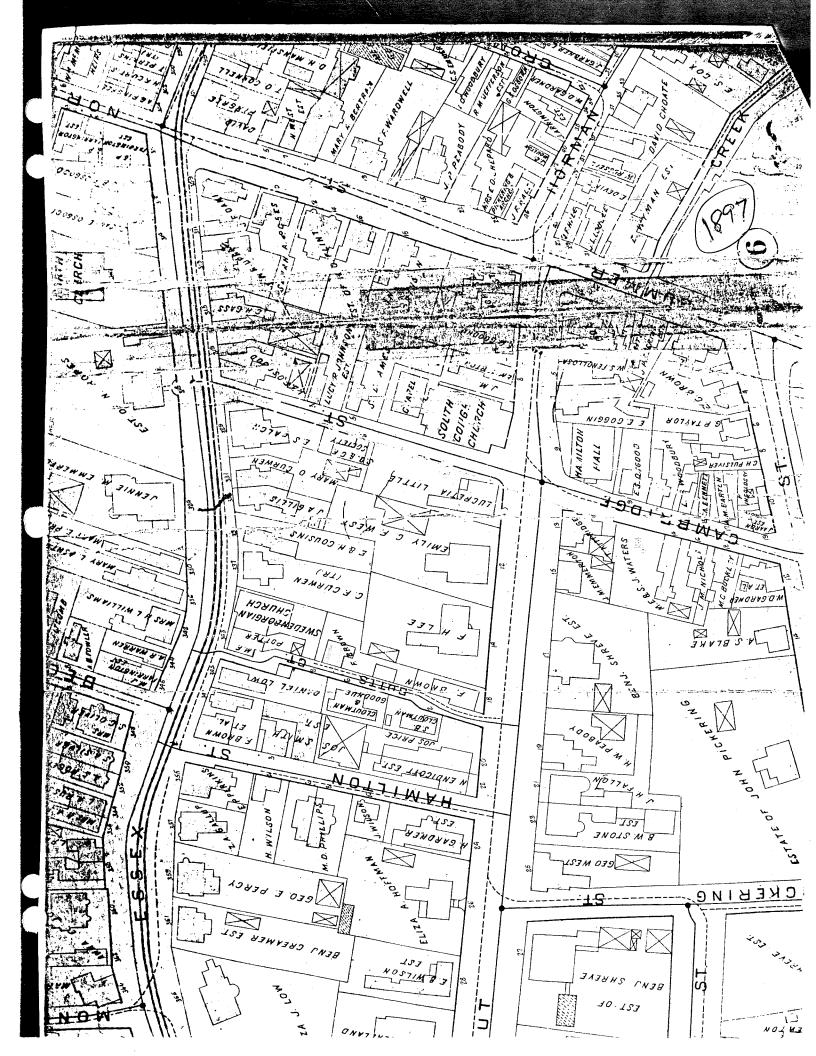

After this experience, Bacon settled with relatives who lived in the western end of what was known as the Addison Richardson house in the western part of Salem. On November 30, 1780, he married a daughter of this family, Sarah Brown, widow of Joseph Gardner of Salem. She died on May 2, 1785, and on September 16, 1790, the Doctor married Sarah Adams, the daughter of a retired Danish mariner who kept a public house next to the Richardson place. Bacon kept this tavern until this Sarah died in late December, 1813. After this, according to William Bentley (A.B. 1777), his life was "not so correct" as it "ought to have been," and he "was poor":

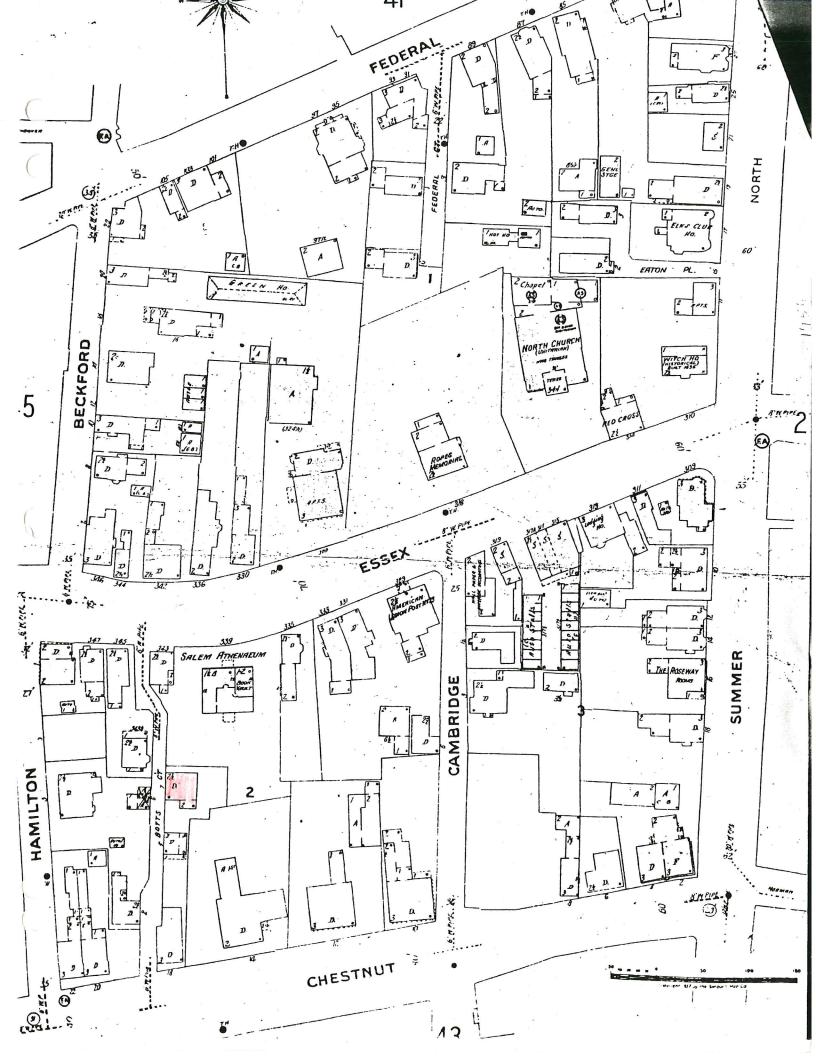

Since I knew him I have been doubtful of his habits, but nothing in the interview with him at his next neighbour Addison Richardson's was unworthy of a man of observation and letters. He seems however to have lived in great obscurity, never censured, but seldom noticed on any occasion. This could not be from any part of his personal character but probably from his domestic situation.⁴

This obscurity is the more curious in that he had a connection by marriage with the Salem Pickerings, which ought to have been the making of a young physician. He died at Salem on July 28, 1816, leaving one daughter, Sally, who was born in 1785 and lived unmarried until 1865.
