No Cure for Mourning examines the relationship between art making and the experience of loss. This exhibition surveys the various practices artists have employed to acknowledge and address moments of mourning. No Cure for Mourning integrates both personal narratives of loss as well as community responses to major loss events, including perspectives on contemporary and historical grief. The range of both the experiences and mediums highlights the unique yet universal phenomenon of grief in the human experience. The exhibition also maps the use of art not as a healing device or an act of redemption but as a means of reflection and finding connection.
