we come to Centre expecting many things . . . a chance to make new friends . . . to enjoy greater social independence . . . to meet new academic challenges, free of the trivialities of high school . . . we are numbed by the newness of our experience — for awhile . . .

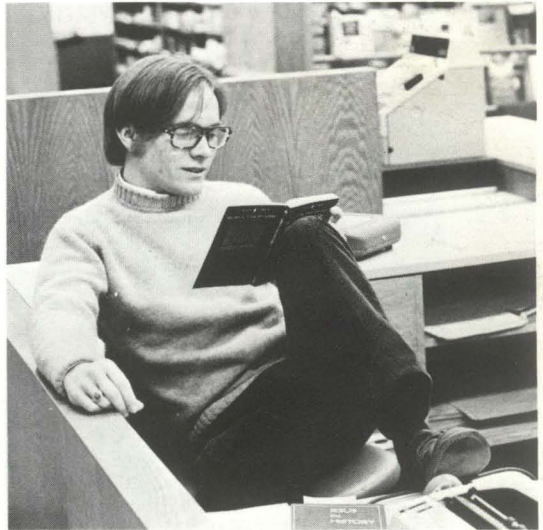

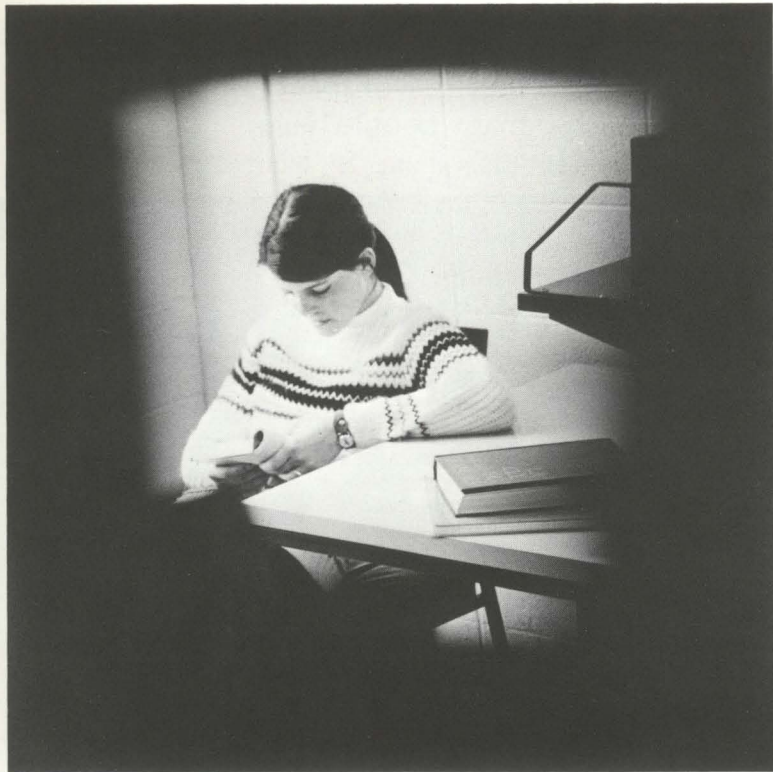

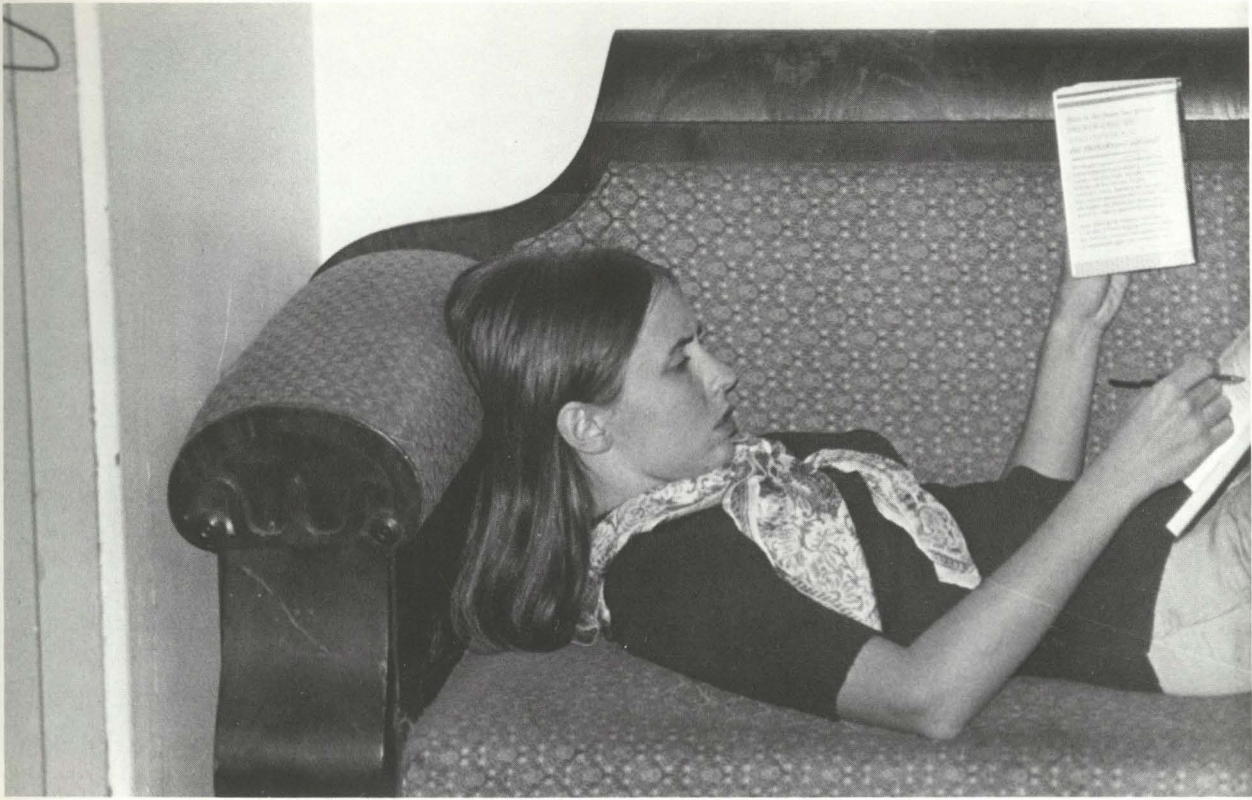

the routine of classes and the demands of daily living quickly bring us back down to earth . . .

we discover that after only a week of classes we are behind . . .

and we search for a place and a time to study . . .

but studying becomes harder and harder as doubts and fears crowd our mind . . . our new friends seem more trouble than they're worth as the frustrations of living with so many people begin to outweigh the joys . . .

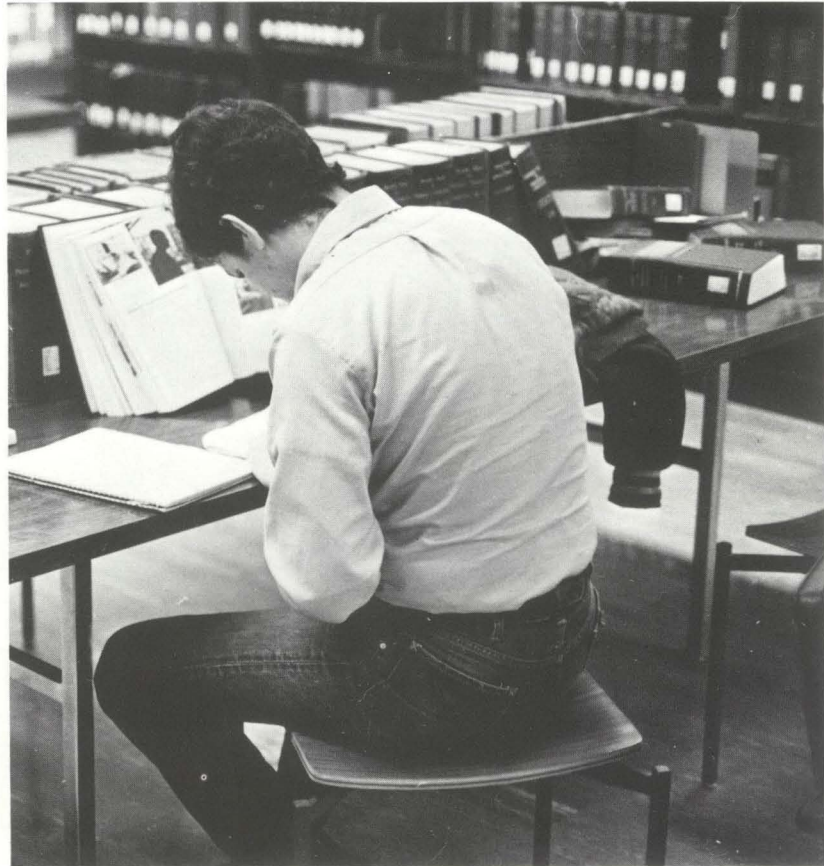

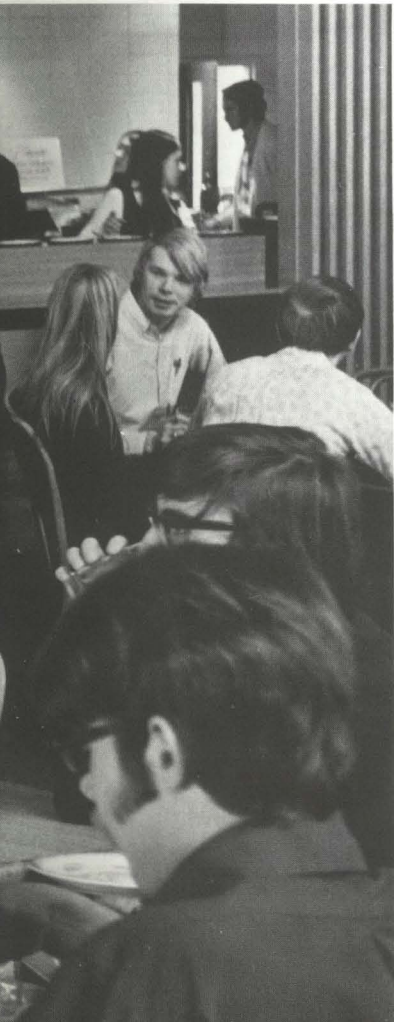

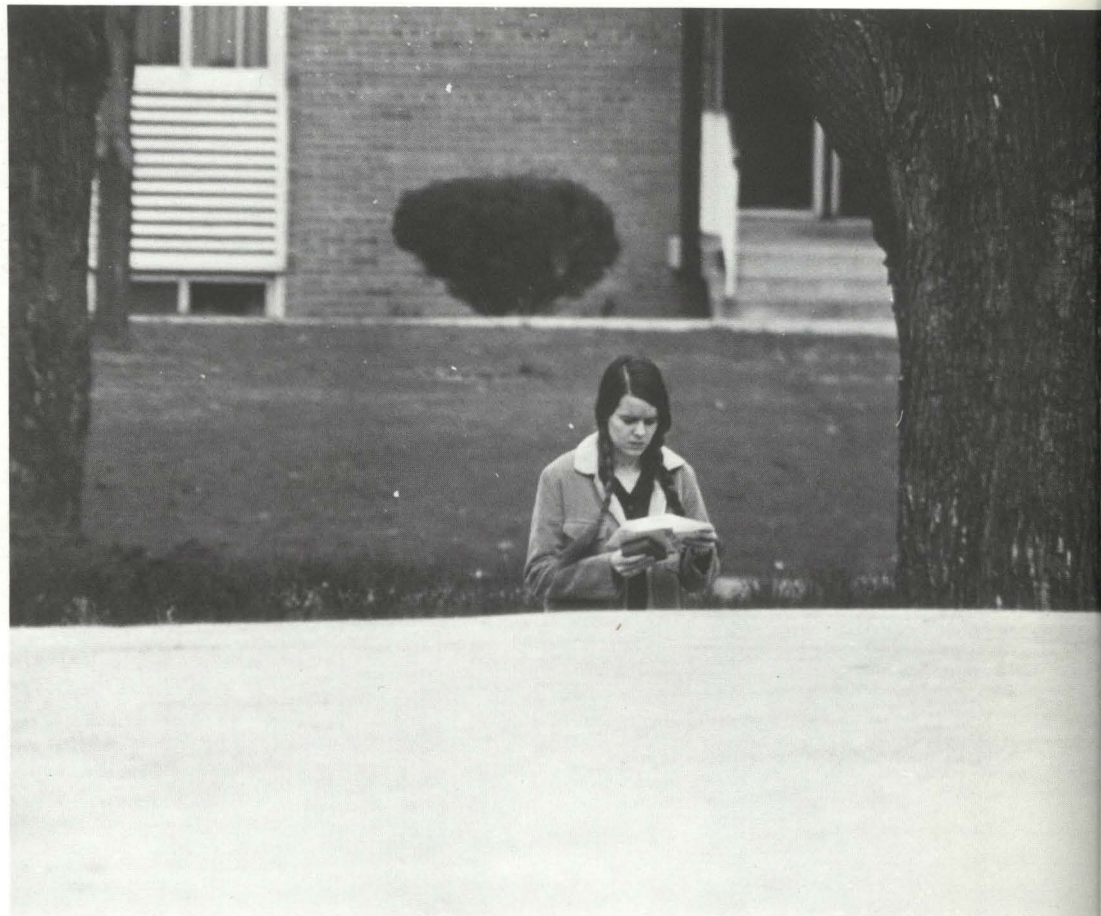

we question the value of our social independence in a community of six fraternities, one movie theatre, and a variety of pool rooms . . .

and academic challenges appear to be academic impossibilities as reading and writing assignments fall due . . .

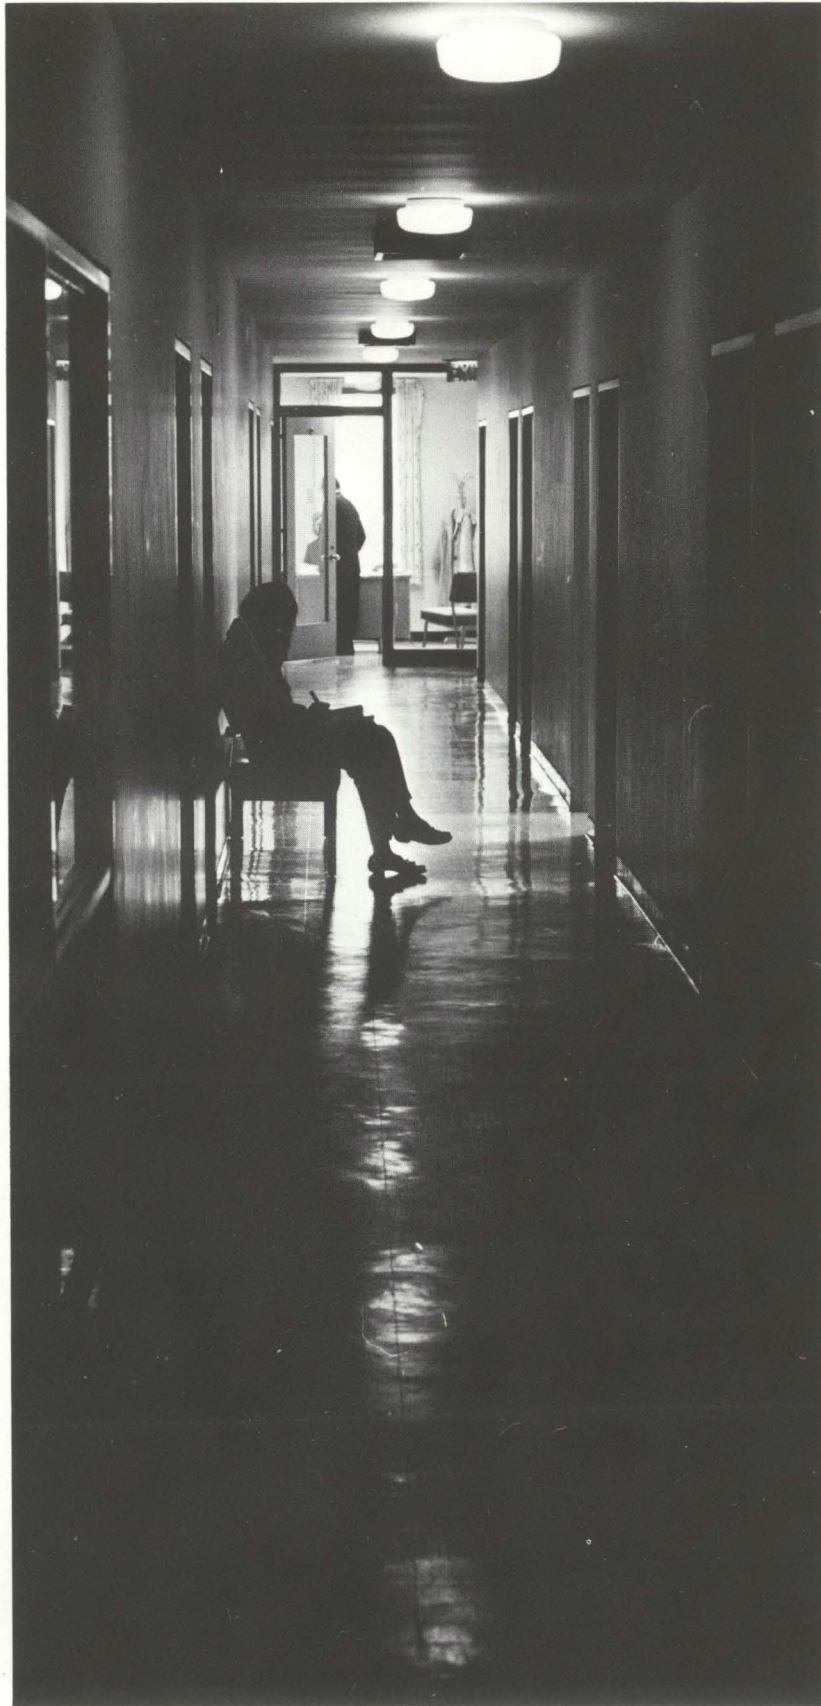

our insecurity results in almost complete isolation . . . and we want to quit . . . to leave this high pressure world and return to the old friends, the dependence, the comfortable trivialities of the past . . .

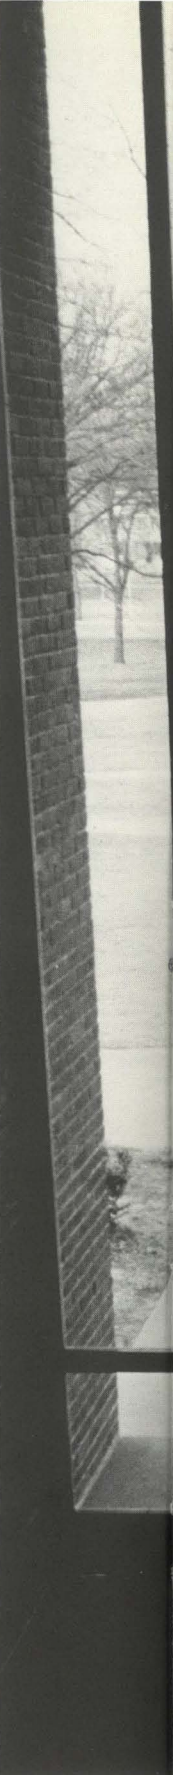

but for some reason we don't . . . we endure . . . slowly our mind clears . . . we gain confidence . . . and we begin to experience Centre in a new, more realistic way . . .
not as an excited and disillusioned observer but as an alert, critical participant . . .

we try to reach out in a thousand different ways . . . to touch the people around us . . .

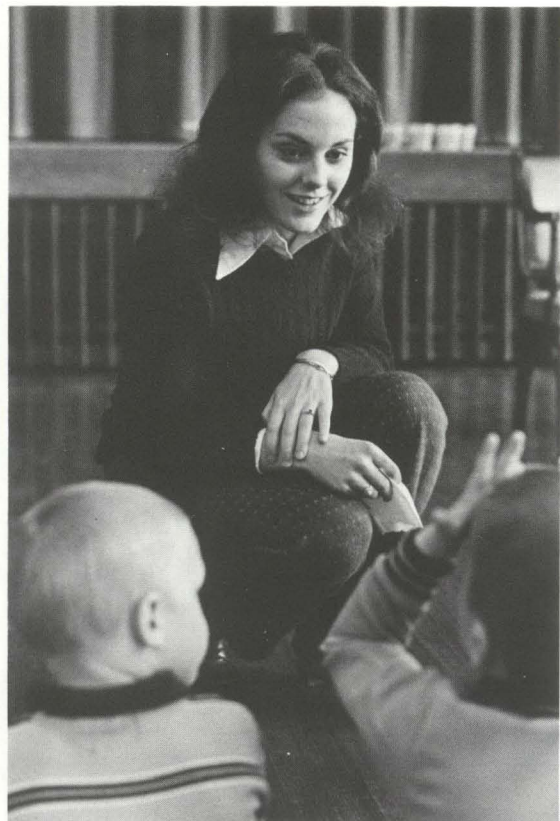

to see things through their eyes . . . and capture a little of the magic for ourselves . . .

we play together and talk together . . .
sharing a part of us with someone else . . .

letting the act of sharing serve as a relief from the solitude of the self . . .

but the time comes when we must act alone . . . and prove ourselves to ourselves . . .

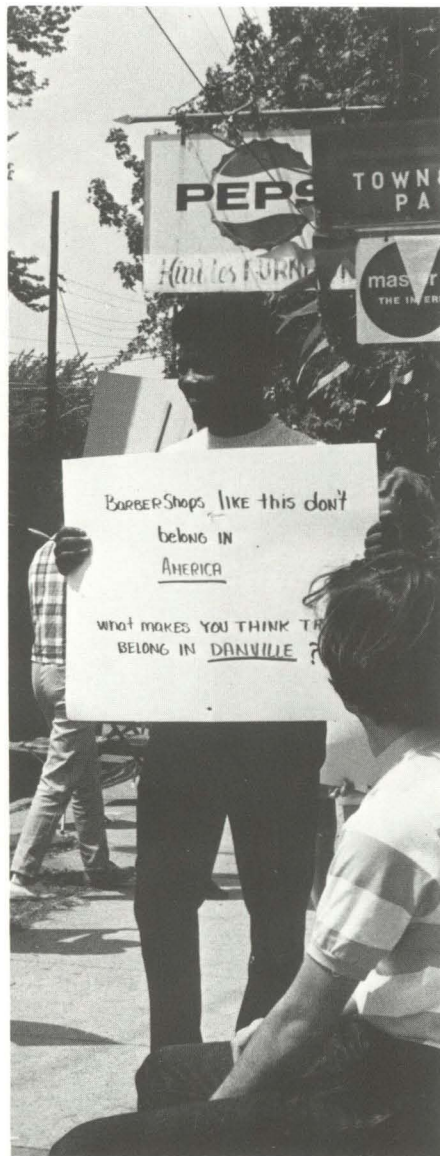

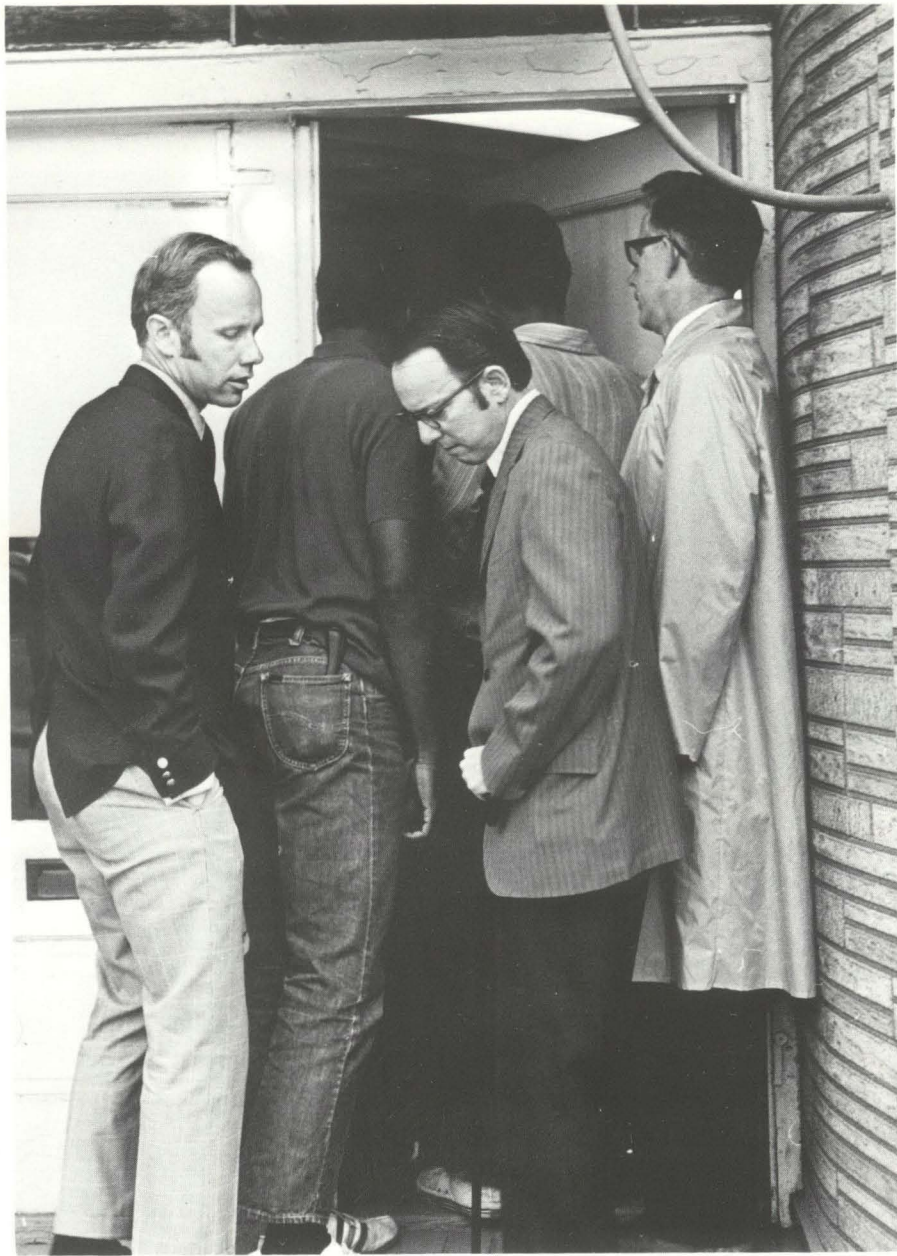

relevance becomes a key word in our vocabulary
as we compare theory to practice . . . the classroom to reality . . . and the "Centre College Community" to the world-at-large . . .

perhaps we sometimes see things from an acute angle . . . but our comparisons reveal gaps . . . and in our attempt to close them, we challenge Danville and Boyle County . . .

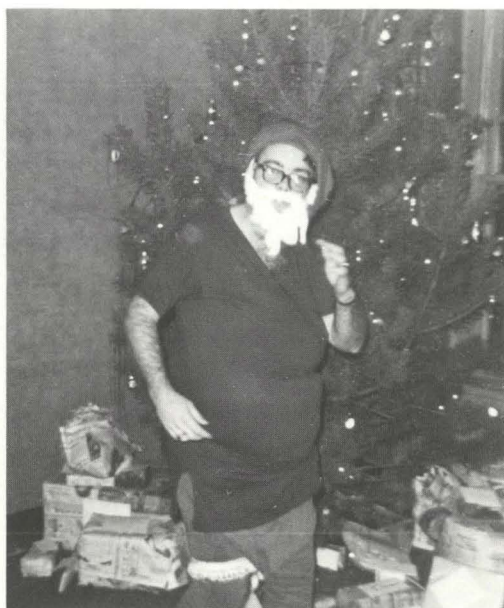

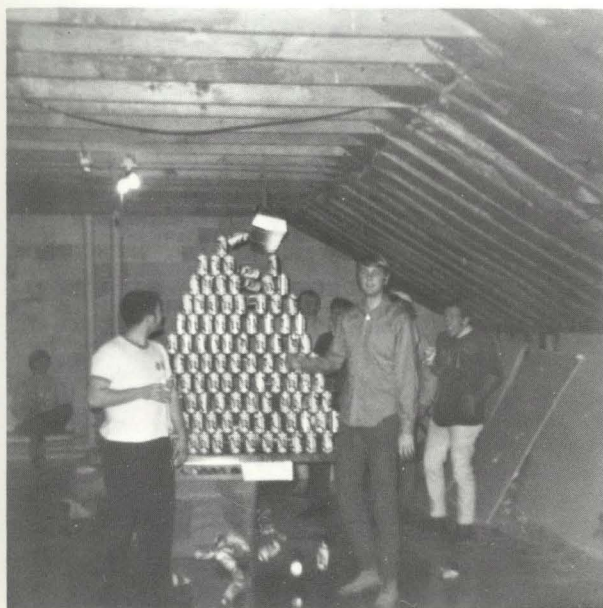

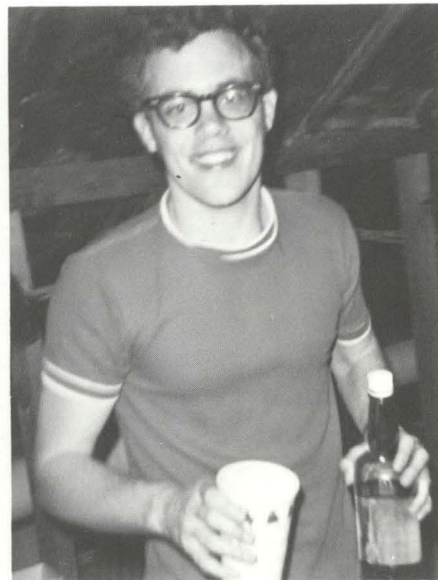

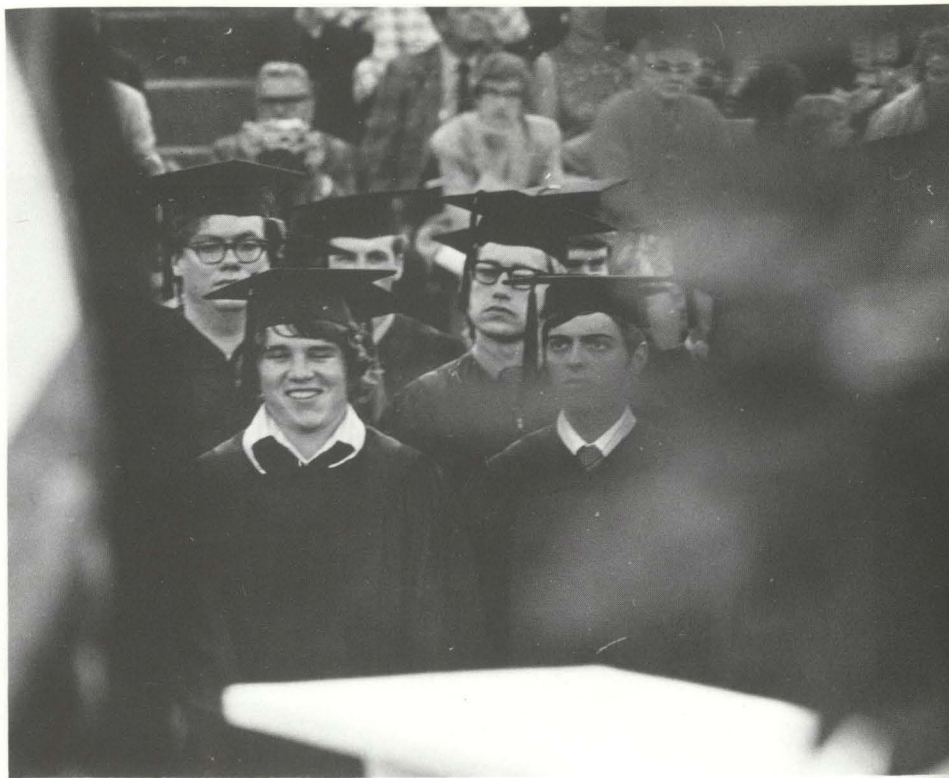

but changes take time . . . and even the most ardent crusaders learn that humor is a valuable asset . . . so what outsiders see as a carefree life is our own effort to hang loose . . . to see the irony of a situation (afterall, who gets a haircut, anyway?) . . .

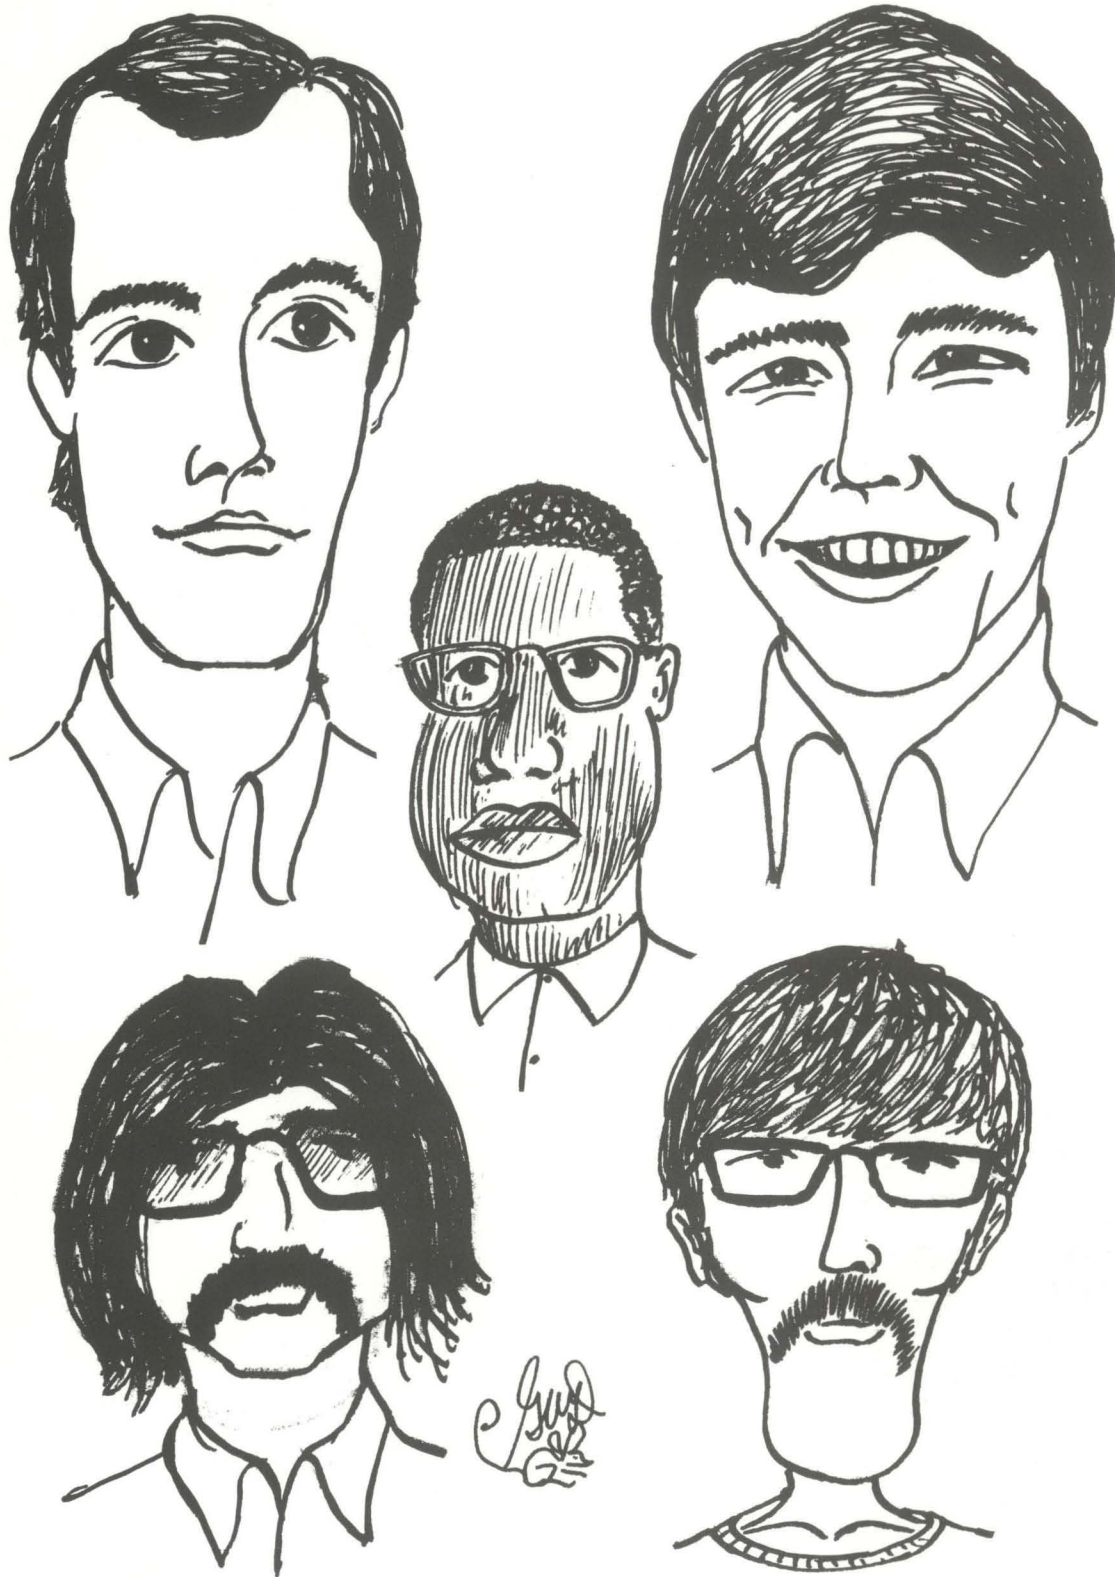

and to laugh . . .

cartoon by Gary Durrett

we even laugh at our own lingering desire for parade and pageantry . . .

the continuing of out-dated traditions that once drew students together . . . and gave them a sense of community . . .

we sometimes get a glimpse of what it was like . . . just enough to wish we still had it . . .
and know that we don't . . .

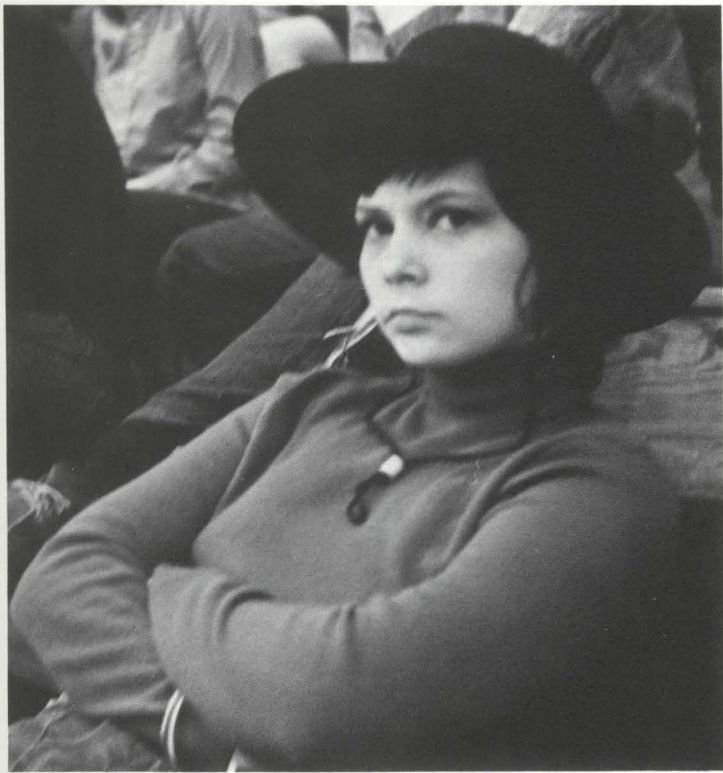

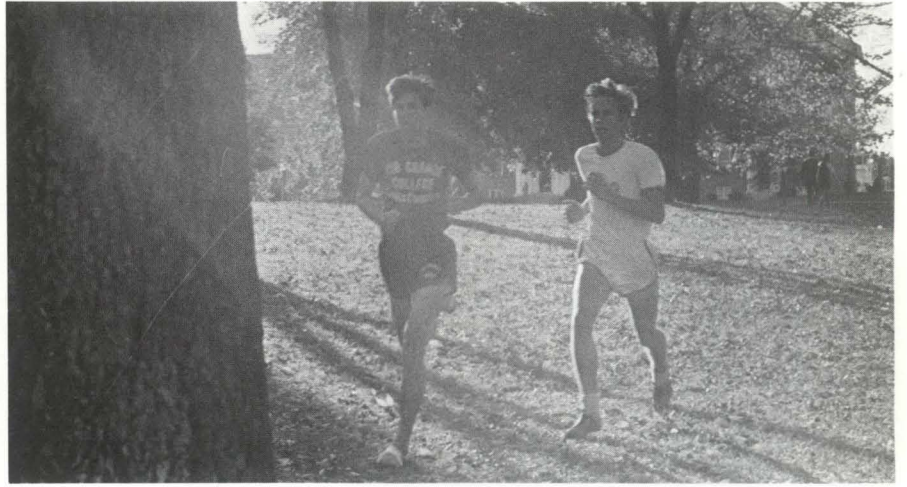

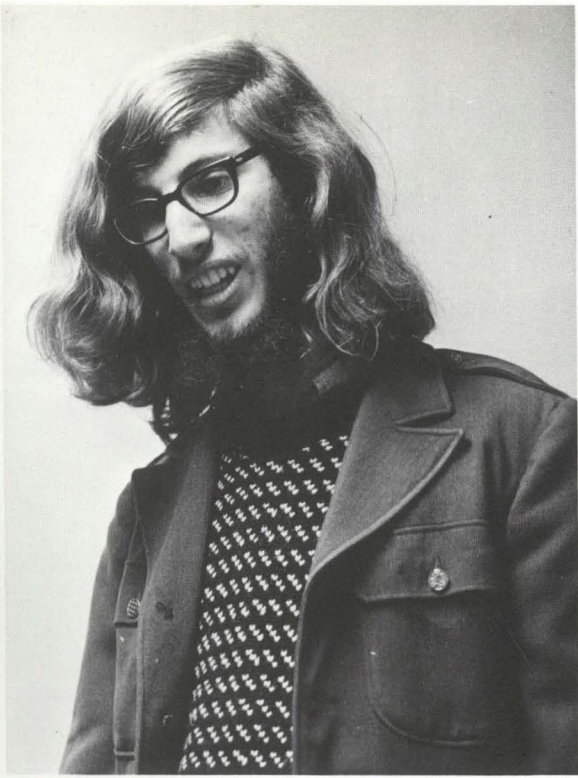

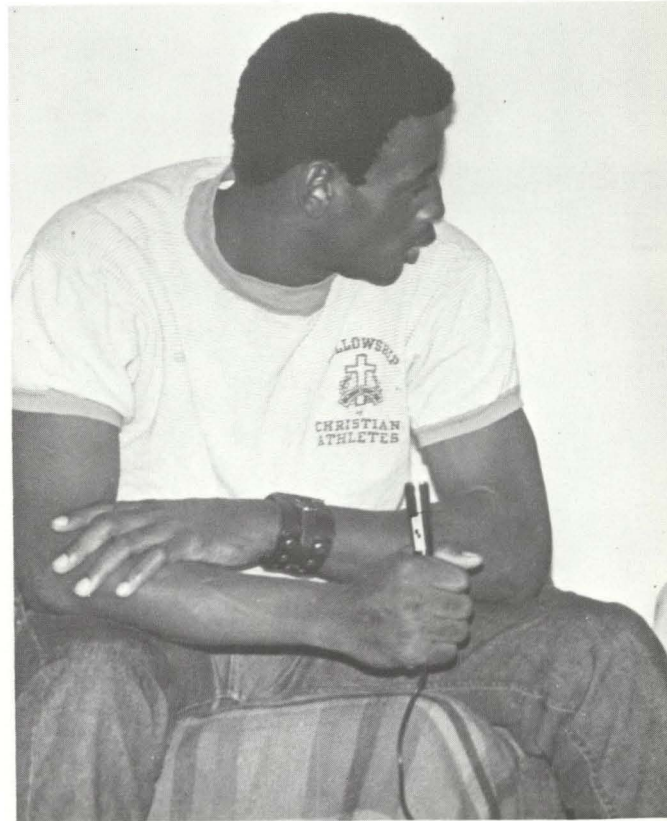

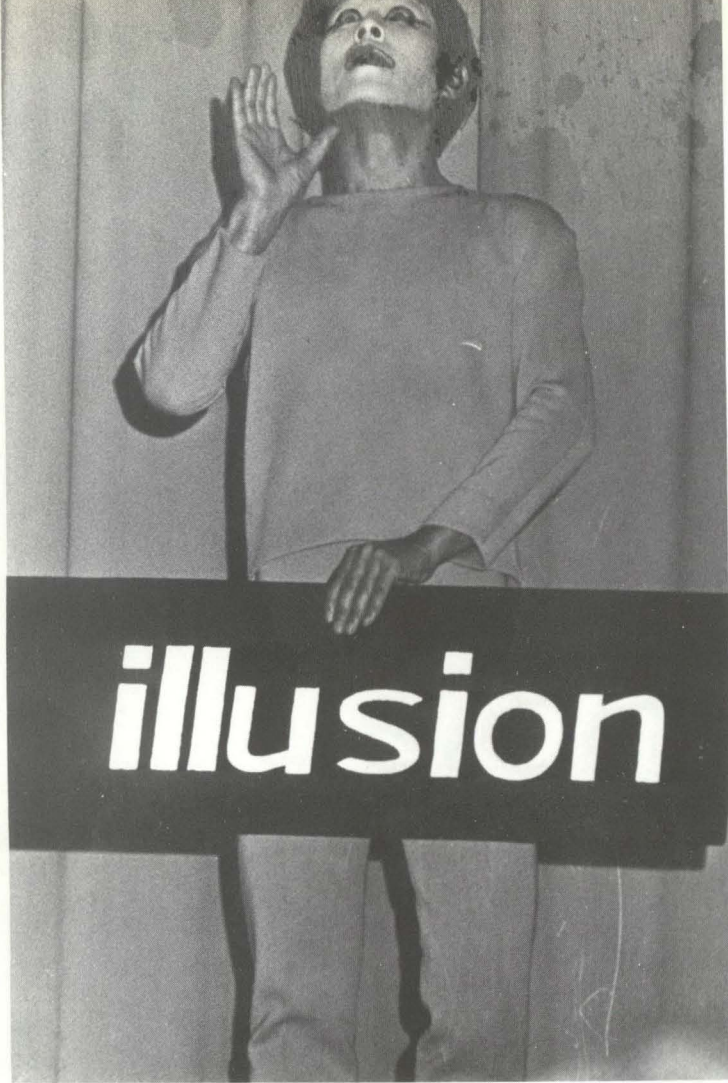

perhaps widespread communion is impossible today . . . anyway, diversity of interest and opinion is sometimes indicative of a richer and more complex environment . . .

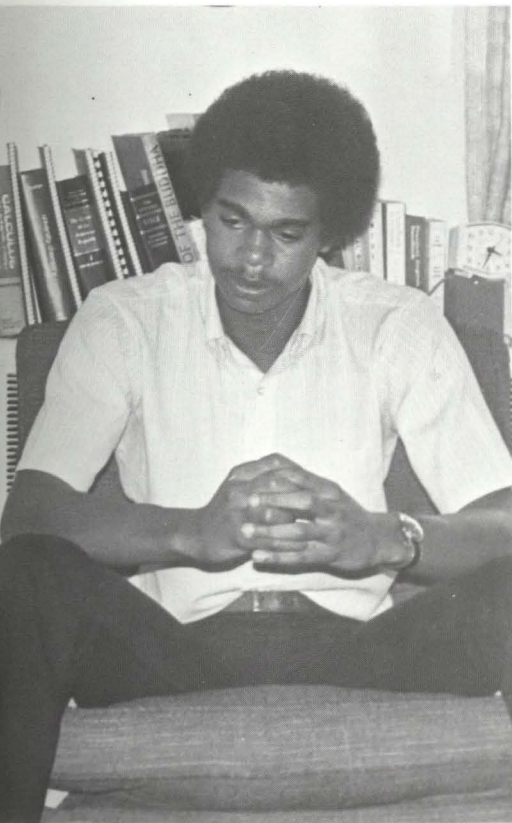

and such diversity could lead to an appreciation and understanding of more people . . . more ways of life . . . and to a kind of freedom . . . .

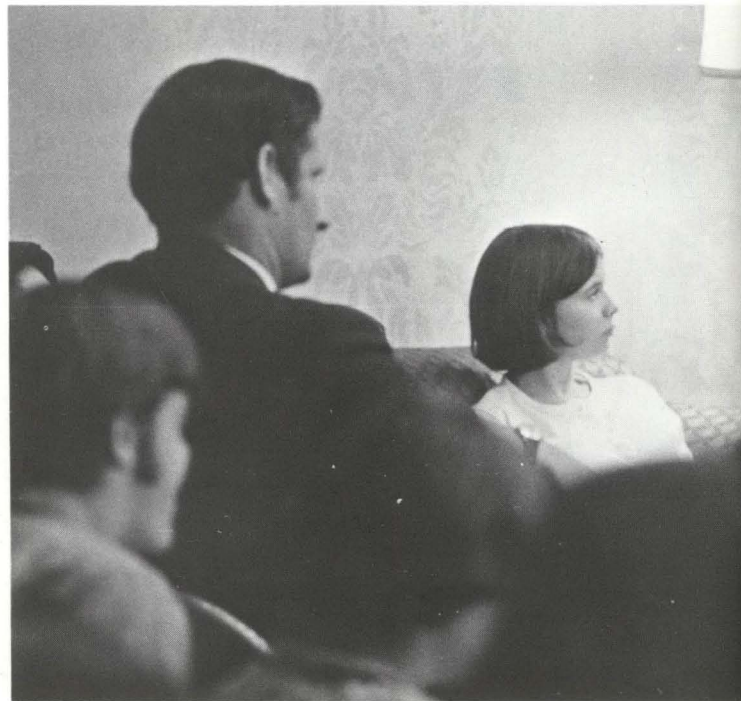

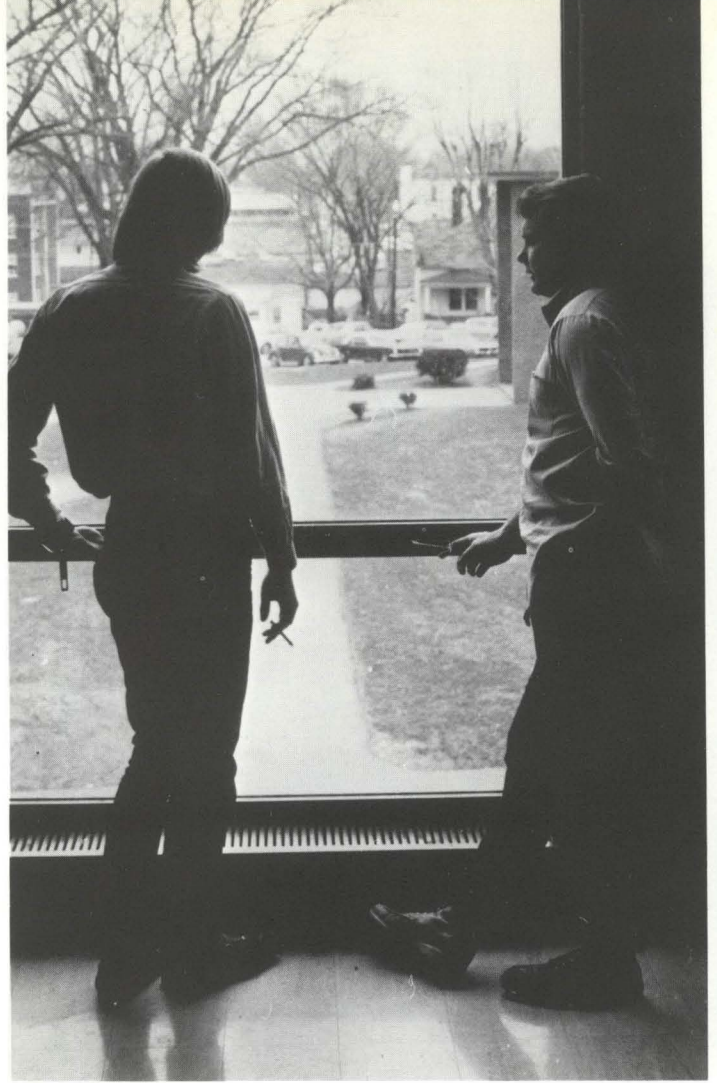

one that could help us
when we think we're looking wide to look wider still . . .

but it's not easy . . . for to appreciate someone else we must first appreciate ourselves . . .
that which is good in us — even that which is not so good . . . and there's always the chance that we'll miss the good when we look for it . . . become dissatisfied . . . and put understanding and freedom even more out of reach . . .

with the risk of self-examination running so high, perhaps if we expect anything of Centre, it should be to reduce that risk . . . to help each of us find a way of handling our circumstances by making us intensely aware of our own humanness . . . and our relation and obligation to the life about us . . .

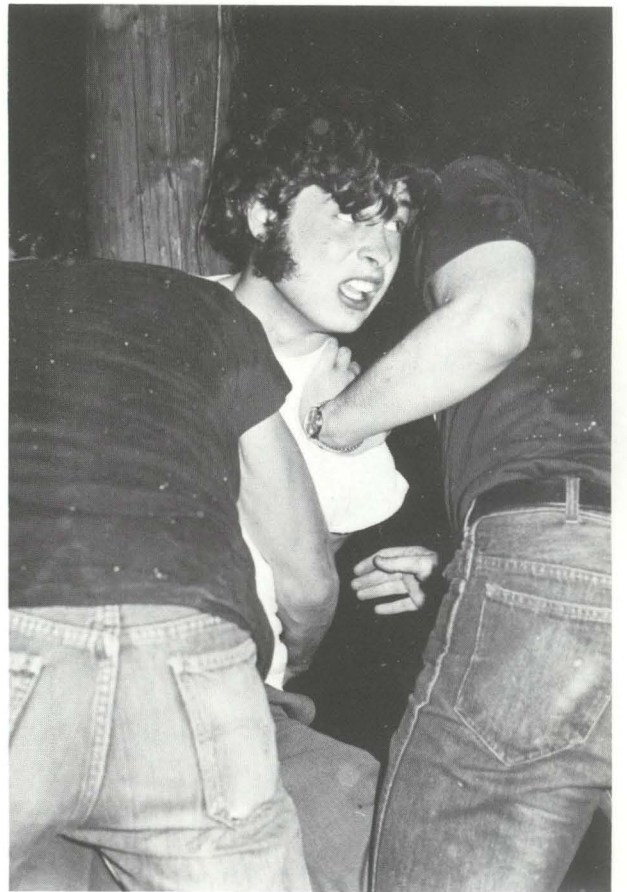

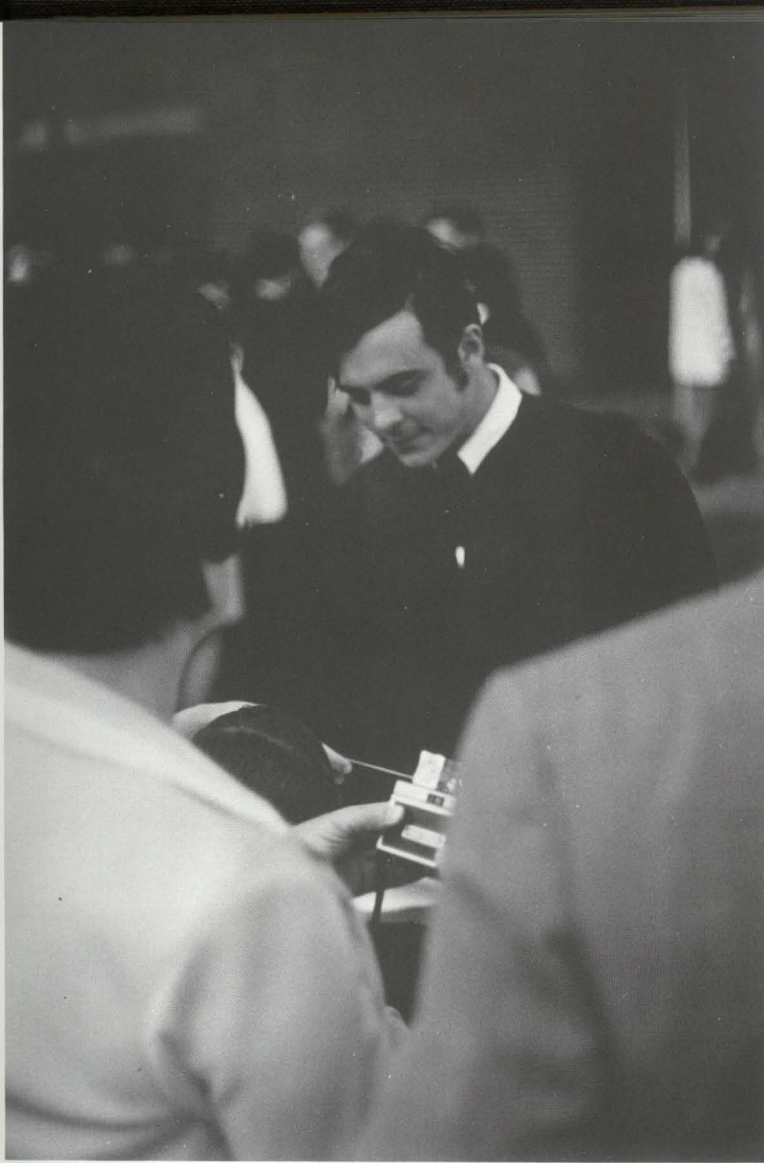

if it were a place where a person could grow, mature, and become a stronger individual . . . then the frustrations, disappointments, and pressure would serve a purpose . . .

it would be more than a place to make new friends . . . enjoy greater social independence . . . and meet new academic challenges . . .

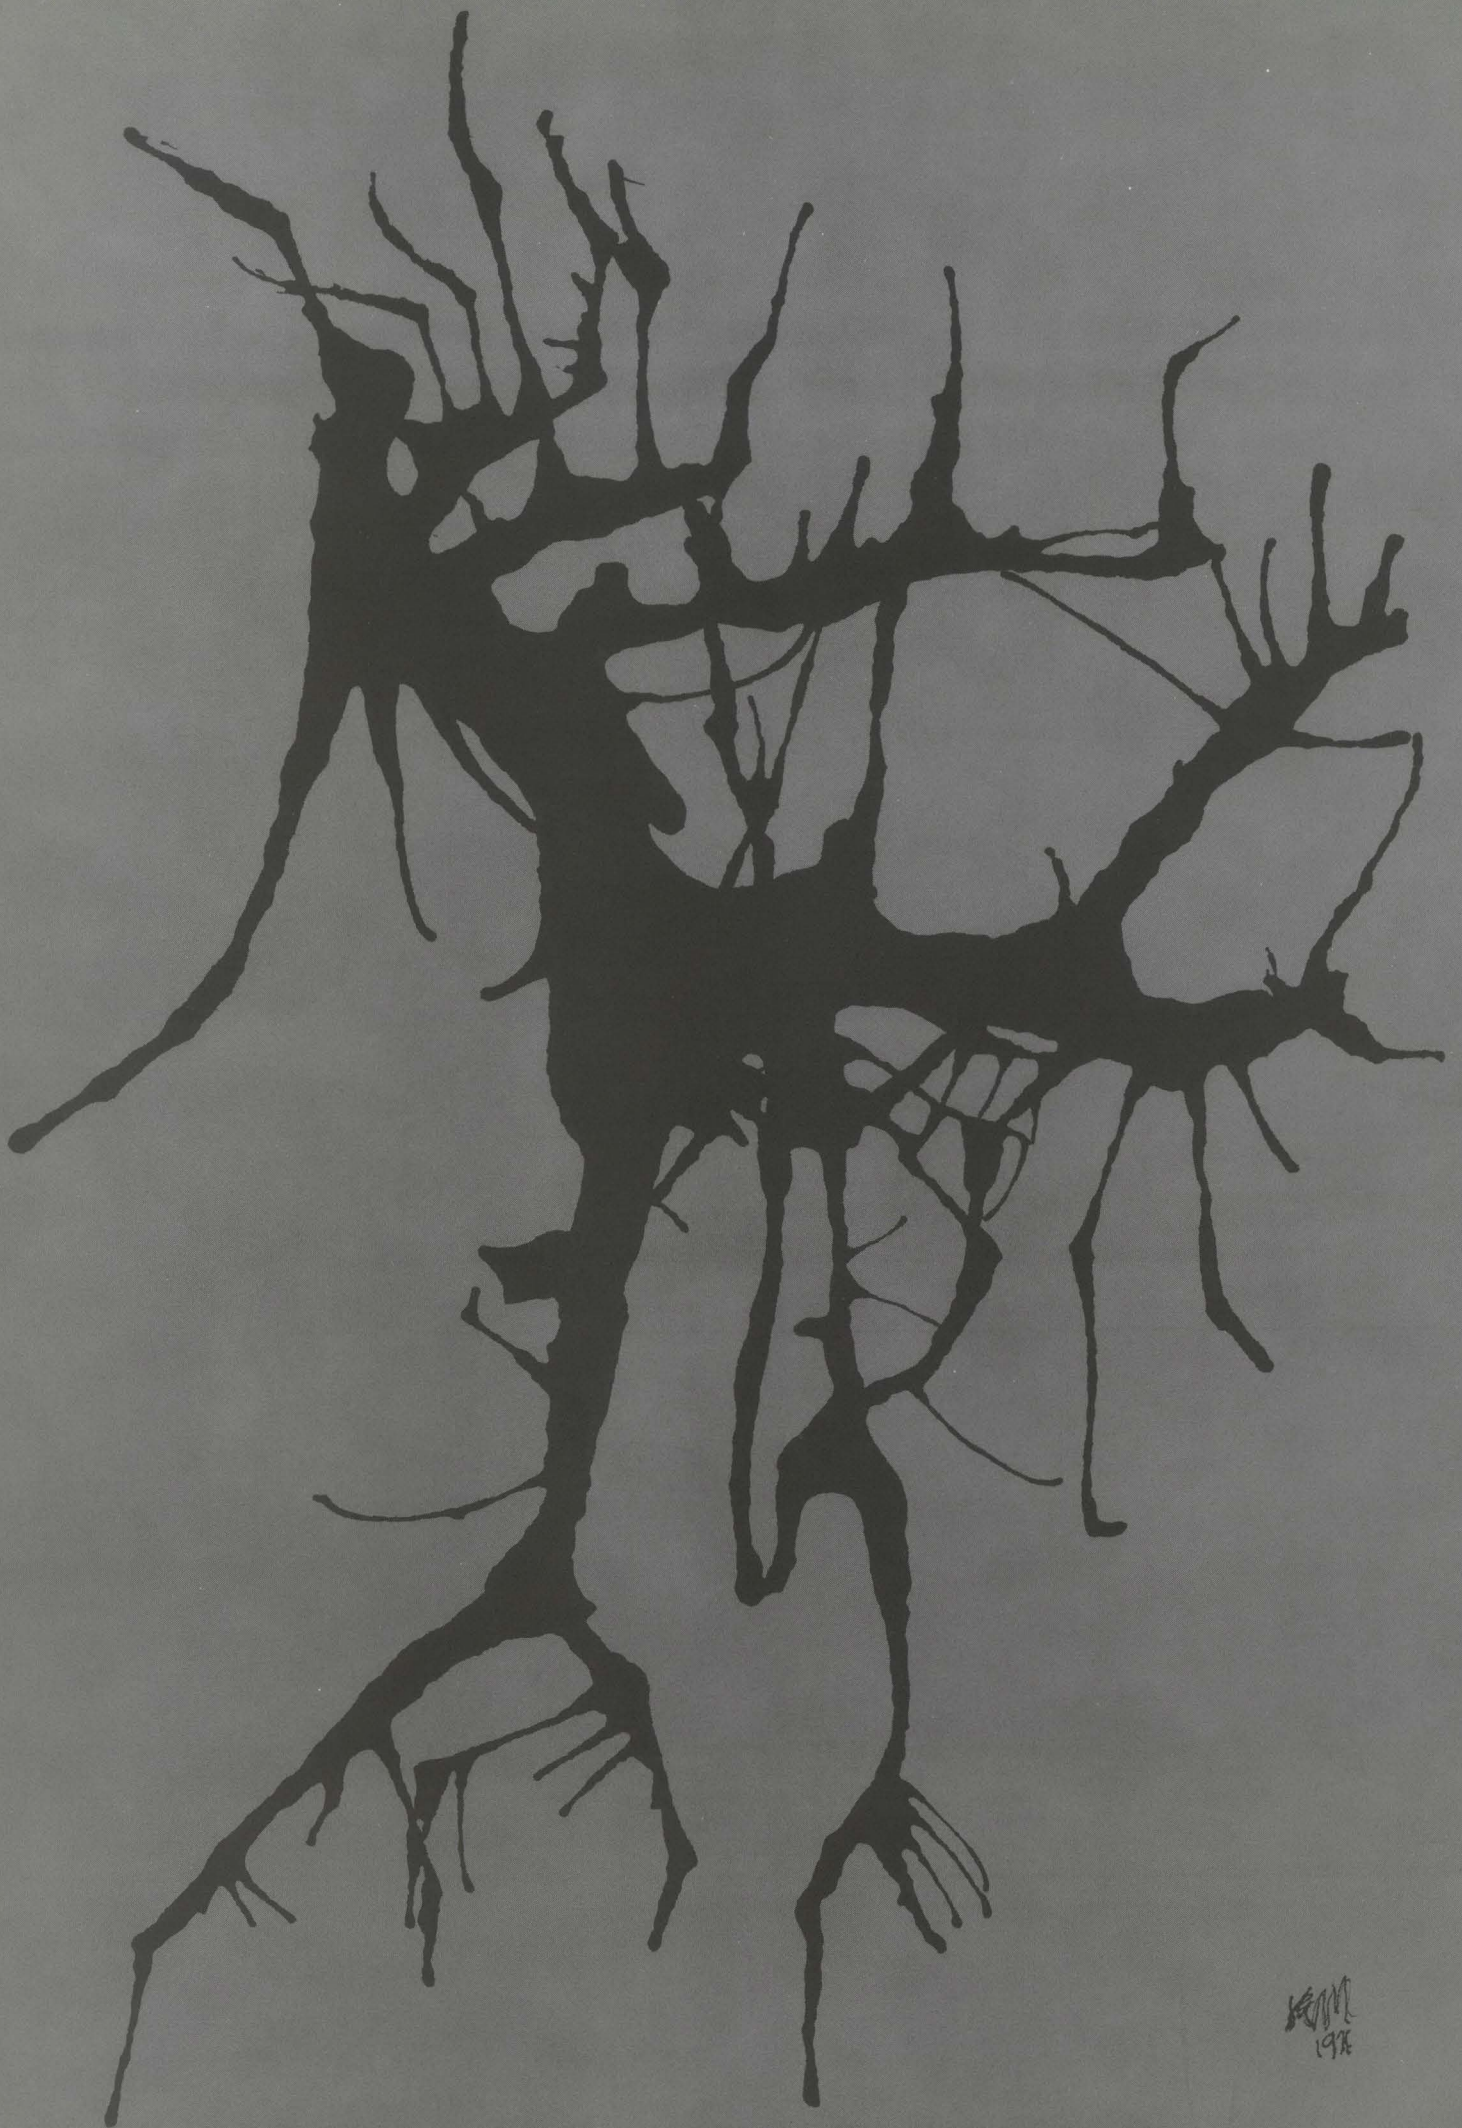

for each of us . . .

Centre would be a quietly dynamic experience . . . .

DOVER PUBLISHERS

Trustees, administration, and faculty

. . . appear as unwavering, stark pillars of knowledge to freshmen . . . as intelligent, but delightful buddies to seniors . . . students rely on faculty advisors for social as well as academic advice and guidance . . . faculty-student conferences take place almost anywhere — 4th floor Doherty, the Hangout, Main Street . . . dinners at the homes of faculty members promote student-teacher closeness . . . serving on one or more of the faculty committees gives professors a voice in shaping and sometimes liberalizing student regulations . . . all student organizations have a faculty sponsor they can call upon for advice or encouragement . . . faculty unity, broken by Doherty-Young division, is restored at faculty meetings, softball games against the Sigs, and the annual Christmas carol in the quadrangle . . .

The primary purpose of any yearbook is to serve as a record of a college's members and activities. But we also feel that a yearbook should say something substantive, commenting on the quality of life. In both cases accuracy is of the greatest importance, but it is much harder to achieve in the second for such commentary is by necessity generalized and based on the commentator's own reactions. If, as editors, we have failed to be accurate, either in our report or our commentary, we beg your pardon. Our only real purpose was to make the yearbook meaningful for each of us.

We want to thank the Publications Board for giving us the job . . . we've gotten to know some people we never knew before and we now know some of you better. We also want to thank the Cento editors and Bob Ensminger for their cooperative and sympathetic spirits.

Now, if you really want to be helpful, you will read this book with a critical eye and report your reactions to your '72 editors — Teresa Kiser and Leonard Thibadeau.
