* * * *

FORT MONROE-EUCOM - 9 to 22 SEPTEMBER 1950. (Data obtained from Major General J. P. Sullivan, QM of Fort Monroe) General Clark and party - consisting of Major General J. P. Sullivan, Brig. General Wayne C. Zimmerman, Colonel John P. Eckert, Colonel Normando A. Costello, Colonel W. D. Smith, Colonel Wilhelm P. Johnson, Colonel Nelson M. Lynde, Jr., Lt. Col. William A. Cunningham and Colonel Frank G. Trew, from OCAFF, as well as two Air Force officers - departed Langley Field at 0600 hours and flew to Steventon, Newfoundland, arriving there at 1420 hours. A defective elevator on the plane in need of repair delayed the departure three hours, during which time the party toured the field and were shown all courtesies by the Commanding Officer, Lt. Colonel Rosenbaum. The group went over wartime projects, looked over the B-29 groups, and at 1700 hours took off. The flight was smooth, but overcast until reaching Shannon Airport at Limerick, Ireland at 0730 hours, 10 September. The plane was checked, gassed, and then took off for Frankfurt, Germany, arriving there at 1315 hours, circling the field for 15 minutes prior to landing. General Thomas Handy, Lt. General M. S. Eddy, and Major General Daniel Noce met the plane. The press was also on hand and new phases of training were discussed and plans for developing divisions from the ground for nine months were elaborated.

The group then went to the Group House and on into Frankfurt.

An Honor Guard was held for General Clark at 0830 hours, 11 September, and a drill by a colored detachment, which proved very original and fine. The soldiers were well dressed, performed well, and the uniforms were excellent. They wore a blue scarf, and down through the center of the scarf was a crease, which improved the appearance. Also the white lacing and the uniform method of lacing added much to the appearance. A briefing was then held at the Stadt House. The maps used were new and different, topographical features were shown in colors. The briefing lasted about one and one-half hours.

General Clark's departure was advanced to Wednesday morning at 0800 hours 13 September, to visit Darmstadt, thence to Berlin and over to Vienna. The school quarters at Darmstadt was proving a controversial one, whether or not its continuance was justified. Inspections continued and on the 13th the group departed Heidelberg for Darmstadt. General Eddy accompanied General Clark. Darmstadt proved a school in fine condition (Quartermaster School) altho it was an acknowledged fact that the man behind the helm was a Lieutenant Colonel, not the Colonel in charge. The group then inspected the Adjutant General school, presided over by a Brig. General Fitch. The activities were well presented. The group then went over to the War Dogs Platoon, commanded by a Captain Kulp, who had served under General Sullivan in 5th Army. General Clark returned to the Frankfurt airport where he was met by two civilians from LIFE magazine who were appointed to cover the General's trip. One was Mr. Martin O'Neil, Frankfurt Press Center, APO 757, and he had secured authority from General Joseph Cannon to make the trip. The General discussed with these men the purposes of the ground forces, what their mission was, etc. The trip to Berlin took one hour and 15 minutes, and arriving at the large airport, the party was met by General Maxwell D. Taylor and Colonel Daniels. A Guard of Honor was present. The General went all over Tempelhof and then out to the American Headquarters for additional honors. It all was impressive. The troops were lined up for a distance of about 200 yards, and between the four members of General Clark's group marched. Honors were rendered and then a group of American soldiers on horseback paraded in review. The group then went to the VIP Club on Lake Wannsee where Secretary Marshall and the General had met for discussion of American policy prior to the Moscow conference. General Clark and General Sullivan lunched with two air officers, one of whom commanded Tempelhof Airport, the other a member of a Security Commission. Following lunch, General Clark toured Berlin, going first to the Marshall Plan Building erected by ECA, then down into the Russian area. In this latter area, the wreckage of war was uncleared, the people dirty and ragged, and hundreds of women doing laboring work in the ruins, digging out bricks, cleaning away cobble, etc. He then toured the main governmental part of Berlin, then down to the Hotel Adlon, which was a wreck, into the Reichstag, and back to headquarters for a briefing by General Taylor. The Soviet forces to the East number about six armies, about 33 divisions - a total perhaps of 338,000 men. Following the briefing, the General went to General Taylor's home where he spent the night. At 2000 hours a formal dinner was held for about fourteen guests. Included were the French High Commissioner and his wife, Colonel and Mrs. Daniels, a Navy Captain who was head of Naval Intelligence at Rhine-Main headquarters, the British High Commissioner and one or two other guests, as well as a State Department man and his wife, named Jones, just in from Trieste, the Italian Consul General and his wife, who is an American woman from Chicago and during the war an inmate of a Jewish concentration center near Turkey.

The main point is that the Russians want the Ruhr. Germany, even in the east, is essentially capitalistic and not communistic, but until they know where they stand, should the Russians advance, they will bow their heads and take this wave of Russian on their backs. The Naval Attache stated it was possible to get the infantry for some 30 divisions from German manpower, that we could support them with artillery. There seems to be little agreement between British and French. There is also agreement that the Germans will fight communism and they do not wish a police state. They are interested in knowing if they will be armed, and when this decision is made, who will supply their arms. Because of their heavy industry, this is a most important question. On the whole, it was agreed that this expenditure may cost some 20 billion dollars before we were through. General Taylor talked on internal troubles and the things the Soviets want. The industrial output of Germany is on the upward trend, and this is the thing that the Soviets desire. About 2300 hours the group had coffee and at midnight the General retired.

General Clark arose early and breakfasted at 0600 hours and departed for Tempelhof Airport, airborne at 0730 hours. The trip to Vienna went down the corridor, then over Munich and into Tulln Airport. As a matter of security, the plane was dispatched to Wels after the passengers got off. Lt. General Geoffrey Keyes and General Irwin met the plane at Tulln, with an Air Force guard of honor. General Paul Kendall, Colonel Werner, General Frye, Colonel Hines also were there. General Clark went to the Bank Building, headquarters for U. S. Forces in Austria, for another guard of honor. He then went into the Commanding General's office and was briefed on general situations and lunched in his former dining room. After inspecting troops, there was a press conference in the Oval Room of the Hotel Bristol. Lined up in front were first the American correspondents, and then the Communist correspondents. Colonel L. Mulhall, PID, presided. Interpreters were provided so that all questions were translated into the German language. General Clark made a brief speech telling the correspondents what his job was and the limitations of it, and asked them to confine themselves to that particular angle. This the Communists did not do.

At 1830 hours General and Mrs. Keyes hosted at a cocktail party to which were invited the Austrian dignitaries such as President of Austria Dr. Renner,

Chancellor Figl, the Mayor of Vienna, and Foreign Minister Gruber; all commissioned officers stationed in Vienna, plus important American citizens and top officials. The reception ended at 2000 hours at which time there was a seated dinner for selected guests. General Keyes presided as Toastmaster. A little before the dinner, outside the hotel, about 100 youths in years ranging from 12 to 20 gathered, sponsored by the communists, and shouted "Clark go home! Clark go home!" General Clark walked out upon the porch, looked over the entire gathering, smiled at them, and said "Well, at least I am glad you remember me!" At 2300 hours, with police escort, General Clark went to the Franz-Josef Railroad Station and departed in General Keyes' private train for the Salzburg area.

Captain Bradley was the aide on the train. First stop was at Wells and General Clark detrained at 0800 hours, 15 September. A Guard of Honor was held, and Generals Kendall and Marston took the General through the tactical installations in that area. General Clark then flew to Salzburg in a C-53, and cubbed over the mountains to tactical units. That evening there was a cocktail party and dinner starting at 1830 hours. The dinner was in the Cavalier House outside Salzburg. At 2300 hours General Clark boarded the train and started for Hinterstoder.

General Clark arrived Hinterstoder about 0200 hours, 16 September. Two Jaegers met General Clark and he went hunting with them. The others repaired to the Joachim Villa - where General Clark had his hunting lodge during his tour of duty in Austria - to get it organized for the General's stay. During the day Captain and Mrs. Bernard W. Rogers arrived to see the General. At 1300 hours General Clark went fishing with Jaeger Kniewasser and Jaeger Baumschlager returning about 1730 hours. The General dined about 1830 hours and retired early. Frau Joachim, owner of the villa, arrived from Holland earlier in the evening, and General Clark saw her briefly, at which time she stated she felt the American government should pay her more for her lodge. She was getting 250 Schillings per month.

The next morning, 17 September, at 0920 hours, General Clark went to the Church, after first laying flowers on the grave of the elder Jaeger Kniewasser. In rather solemn procession the party proceeded to the spot where the ceremony of receiving money for new bells for the Hinterstoder Church - gift from Cardinal Spellman through General Clark - would be held. First the Burgermeister spoke, then General Clark. He presented the check in the amount of $577. to the priest. The priest responded to this gift, the band played, and General Clark turned over a spadeful of dirt, and a school to be named The General Clark School was started. Then the German band played a hardly-recognized version of Star-Spangled Banner. CARE packages were distributed, and slowly General Clark and party went down the road to the train, departing Hinterstoder at 1000 hours, arriving Wells at 1130, where they were met by Generals Keyes and Marston, then boarded the plane and took off down through the Brenner Pass, circling Venice, and into Udine, arriving about 1420 hours, where they were met by Major General John Hoge and his aide, and honors were accorded by an Italian guard of honor. The party then drove to Trieste, arriving about 1700 hours at Maxmillian's Castle, where they were briefed by the Trieste staff. About 5,000 troops (USA) are in the Trieste area, 5,000 British under General Airy, and 5,000 Yugoslavs. The Question of what would happen in case of a Soviet advance was discussed, and plans for evacuation being handed by Colonel Wells, G-4. At 2000 hours General and Mrs. Hoge were hosts at a dinner for General Clark and his staff, various officers on duty in the Trieste area, a French official, and the Italian Consul to Trieste.

In the morning, 18 September, after a Guard of Honor, General Clark inspected troops and seeing fire from anti-aircraft batteries. The General then motored to Udine, arriving there about 1230 and taking off for London to arrive at 1725 hours. The weather was perfect and England looked beautiful. The plane landed at Northolt Airport of the Royal Air Force, and was met by an Honor Guard of Royal Air Force soldiers. Lt. General Brownjohn, representing the British Field Marshal, was on hand, as well as the American Military Attache. The General was driven to 2 Park Street and quartered in the Government Hospitality House. After all formalities were over, General Clark met and dined with Lt. Colonel and Mrs. Jack Nygaard, who were visiting in London, and then retired early for a strenuous day ahead.

The next morning, 19 September, at 1015 hours, Major General W. P. Oliver, Chief Army Instructor of the Imperial Defence College, came to take General Clark to the Imperial Defence College. Upon arrival, General Clark was met by Admiral Sir Charles Daniel, the commandant. The group then proceeded to the Assembly Hall where about 200 officers of all branches of the service were assembled to hear General Clark speak. After a brief introduction, General Clark spoke for about 50 minutes, followed by a question period which lasted another 50 minutes. Admiral Daniel took General Clark and his party to lunch at the Senior United Service Club in Pall Mall. Those present were in addition General Oliver, General Gale, Colonel Kessinger and General Sullivan. There they were joined by Lt. Colonel Fanshawe, aide-de-camp to Field Marshal Slim, who took the General to a prearranged appointment with Mr. Shinwell, Minister of War. Mr. Shinwell was most cordial in his greeting, and discussed the general European situation and said that both England and France must contribute their quota to the Atlantic Pact. He inquired of the General if he was going to head the Atlantic Pact, to which General Clark replied he was not being considered. Mr. Shinwell did most of the talking and all about international problems. He is a small man, keen and alert, making a favorable impression. After this meeting, General Clark saw the directors of the British Army with Lt. General Richard N. Gale. Their names, in addition to General Gale who directs the military training, were: Major General Hull, director of staff duties; Major General Bower, director of land and air warfare; Major General Redman, director of military operations; Brigadier Johnston, deputy director of military intelligence; Major General Scott, director of signals; General Walsh, director of weapons development; Major General Rawlins, director of artillery; Major General Campbell, director of engineers.

That night Counsellor Julius C. Holmes of the American Embassy gave a dinner for General Clark. Among those present were Field Marshal Slim, Robert Murphy, the ambassador to Belgium, Captain Fowlkes of the Royal Navy, Colonel Draper, Brigadier Strong, Admiral Connolly, Major General Lewis, Colonel Kessinger, Commander Bill Jewell, Major General Kibbler and Lt. General Brownjohn. Preceding this dinner, General Clark visited Mrs. Holmes and the children. The dinner ended about 2300 hours and General Clark walked home, accompanied by General Sullivan and Ambassador Murphy.

On 20 September, General Gale called for the General at 0930 hours and drove to Camberley to the British Staff College, arriving 1100 hours, where met by Major General Ward, the Commandant, whom the General had last seen at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, on his trip there in June. General Clark toured the school and made a talk to about 150 officers, followed by a question period, in which ground-air operations were stressed. About 1430 hours the group departed for London, arriving there about 1600 hours. At 1945 hours there was a dinner in honor of General Clark and Major General C. L. deW. du Toit, Chief of the General Staff, Union Defence Forces, South Africa. This was an Army Council Dinner at Grosvenor House.

The morning of 21 September, General Clark and General Sullivan, together with General Gale and Colonel Kessinger, went to the Fighting Vehicles Proving Establishment at Chertsey, Surrey, which is a proving ground for the technical development of British vehicles and equipment. The officer in charge was General Clayton, who conducted the group over the establishment. General Clark departed at noon and at 1300 hours arrived at Headquarters of 3rd Air Division where he was met by the commander, Major General Johnson, a guard of honor, after which General Clark inspected the premises. He was then briefed and later met Mr. James Farley, who was on a European tour. At 1430 General Clark boarded his plane. Because of inclement weather, the plane was routed through Iceland, where it landed about 2130 hours. At 2230 hours, the plane left Iceland and flew 1,540 miles into Steventown, New Foundland. The plane laid over a few hours and then took off for Langley Field, arriving there 22 September, about 0900 hours. The General arrived at the office at Fort Monroe at 1000 hours, when he was briefed on the Korean situation. He saw Generals Oxx and Halsey, and then went home to bed at 1130 hours.
