

Dear ,

As you know, I am greatly concerned about our nation's industrial competitiveness and the challenges which face us in our own domestic markets. In particular, the Japanese pose an immediate threat to our continued dominance in such markets as high technology, both at home and abroad.

I recently addressed what I feel are our most urgent productivity problems in a speech before the members of the International Business Center of New England, and I am sending you a copy of that speech.

If you have recommendations or suggestions for legislative action which you feel the Congress might undertake to improve the productive efficiency of our nation's economy, I would like to invite you to send them to me. I shall give them my immediate attention.

Over the last four months I have benefited from the advice of hundreds of individuals, and am extremely grateful for the response I received.

Thank you for your participation in these challenges which affect everyone in our nation.

Sincerely,
